staffe in his hand, and both his legges bound vp, to make the people beleue that he was sicke and diseased. Phocion spying Aristogiton fatte of, cryed out to the Clarke that wrote the bills put in Aristogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muse, howe, or wherefore so sharpe and seuer a man (as by these examples it appeareth he was) could come to the surname of good. Notwithstanding, in the ende I find it a hard thing, but not impossible, that a man should be like wine, both sweete and sharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the first sight, seeme very courteous and gentle of conuersation, and upon better acquaintance, proue churlish and dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should say to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) not come not for my sharpenes, but consider if my sharpenes be without profit. As who should say, men were not to troublefom, but for courteousnes onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, than of insolencie & malice did abuse & contemne their authority. Phocion on thother side, he neuer did Citizens hurt, for any private malice he bare him: but was euer sharpe and cruell to them, which were against any matter he preferred for the benefit of the common wealth. For in all other things, he shewed him selfe maruelous lowly and courteous to euery body, and would be familiar with his aduersaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwise in danger of displeasing with the state. In somuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he spake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O sayd he, honest men neede no helpe. An other time, Aristogiton the Sycophant, being clapped vp in prison, sent vnto Phocion to pray him so come and speake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the prison to him. A though his friends perswaded him the contrary, and answered them: O let me alone, sayd he, for where could I see Aristogiton more gladly then in prison? Furthermore, when there went any army to sea out of Athenis, if there were any other chosen general but Phocion: the townes and Ilandes all alongst the sea coast, (which were friends and confederats of the Athenians) fortified their walls, filled up their hauens, and brought their wiues, slaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, & open warre proclaimed. Contrarily also, if Phocion had bene Capteine and general: they would send out their shippes to the sea to meete him farre of, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and so would bring him to their cities. King Philip secretly seeking to winne the Ile of Euboea, sent an armie thither out of Macedon, and intised the townes by tyrannes to rebell: whereuppon, Plutarke Eretrian praied in ayde of the Athenians, to take this Iland from the Macedonians, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not presently to ayde them. So Phocion was sent general thither, but with a fewe men onely, because they made account the men of that contry would straight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traitors, and rebels, and brybed with king Philippes money, which he launified out amonge them: so that he was brought into great daunger. Thereupon he retyred to a litle hill that is feuered from the fieldes of Tamynes, with a great large valley, and there fortified him selfe with that litle armie he had. Then he perswaded his Capitaines not to care for all those rebels, praters, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forsooke their ensignes and Capitaines, but that they should let goe out of the campe where they would. For, sayd he, such disobedient fouldiers here will doe vs no seruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to serue well: and at home also, knowing them selues in faulte, for that they forsooke the campe without licence, they dare not compleyne apon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to set apon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put them selues in readines, and not to sturte, vntill he had done sacrifice: but he stayed long before he came, either because he could haue no lucky signes of the sacrificies, or els for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereuppon Plutarke Eretrian supposing he deferred to marche for feare, went him selfe first into the field, with certen light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes seeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, stragling out of the campe one after another disorderly, and so did set apon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowen, all the other disperfed them selues, and Plutarke him selfe fled. Then certen bandes of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion hauing ended his sacrifice, the Athenians came out of their campe, and set apon them, and made part of them die immediatly, and part of them also they slue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell should stand still, to receiue their men that were scattered vp and downe the fieldes: and in the meane space, he him selfe, with the choicest men of his armie, gaue charge apon the enemies. The fight was cruell betwene them. For the Athenians fought very valiantly, ventring their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their general, Glaucus, the sonne of Polymedes, and Thallos, the sonne of Cineas, caried the praise away. And so did Cleophanes that daye also shewe him selfe very valiant. For he crying out still apon the horsemen that fled, & perswading them to come and helpe their general that was in daunger: brought them backe againe, and thereby gotte the footemen the victorie. After this battell he draue Plutarke out of Eretria, and tooke the castell of Zabryta, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a straightnes, enuyronned on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his men to take any Greecians prisoners, fearing least the Orators at Athenis might moue the people sodeinly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these thinges were done, Phocion returned backe to Athenis. But then did the confederats of the Athenians straight wishe for his iustice and curtesie: and the Athenians them selues also knewe his skillfulness and manhood. For his succesor Molossus, that was general for the rest of the warre, delt so vndiscreetly that he him selfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip beeing put in maruailous great hope,

A went with all his armie into Hellespont, perswading him selfe, that he should straight take all Cherronesus, the cities of Perinth and Byzantium. The Athenians thereupon determining to send ayde, to preuent king Philippes comming: the Orators made great sute, that Chares might be chosen Capteine. But he being sent thither with a good number of shippes, did no seruice worthy commendacion, neither would the cities receiue his naue: into their hauens: but being suspected of euery man, and despised of his enemies, he was driuen to sayle vp and downe, and to get money of the allies. The people being incensed by the Orators, were maruelously offended, & repented them selues that they had sent ayde vnto the Byzantines. Then Phocion rising vp, spake vnto the people, & told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their confederats they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Capitaines that deferred to be mistrusted. For they, said he, doe make your confederats affraide of you, who without you notwithstanding can not saue themselues. The people chaunging their mindes by his oration, made Phocion againe their Capteine, and sent him with an armie into Hellespont to helpe their confederats there, which was of great importance to saue the citie of Byzantium. Furthermore, Phocion came was so great, that Cleon, the greatest man of vertue and authoritie in Byzantium, and had before bene *Phocion*s companion and familiar in the Academy: he made sute for him vnto the citie. Then the Byzantines would not suffer him (though he desired it) to campe without the walls of their citie, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the Athenians amongest them. Who, perceiving how much the Citizens trusted them, did so honestly behaue them selues in their conuersation amongest them, that they gaue them no maner of cause to complaine of them: and shewed them selues so valiant besides in all battells and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man beeing affraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of Hellespont without any thinge done, and to his great discredit: where Phocion wanne some of his shippes, and recovered againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Furthermore, making diuers inuasions into his contries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was sore hurt there, and so driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great armie that came against him, to defend the contry: Shortly after, the Megarians secretly sent vnto him, to deliuer their citie into his hands. Phocion fearing if the Boeotians vnderstood it, that they would preuent him: he called a common assembly early in the morning, & told the people what message the Megarians had sent vnto him. The people apon his motion being determined to ayde them: Phocion straight founding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the assembly, gaue them no further leysure, but to take their weapons, and so led them incontinently to Megara. The Megarians receiuing him, Phocion shut vp the haue of Nisaea, and brought two long walls from the citie vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: Whereby he stood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the sea, the Athenians were Lordes of it. Now when the Athenians had proclaimed open warre against king Philip, and had chosen other Capitaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the Iles: about all thinges, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the daunger) to accept the condicions of peace. Then one of these busy Orators that was still accusing one or other, said vnto him: why, Phocion, how darest thou attempt to turne the Athenians from warre, hauing now their swordes in their hands: yes truly, said Phocion: though in warre I know I shal commaund thee, & in peace thou wilt commaund me. But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demosthenes caried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from Attica as they could: I pray thee friend, & Phocion vnto him, let vs not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall ouercome, the which if we can so bring to passe, be sure we shall put the warre farre enough from vs. For men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and daunger, where soeuer they be. When the Athenians had lost a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators that hunted after inuocation, preferred Chabrias to be chosen general of the Athenians: whereuppon, the Magistrates & Senators being affraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the Areopagits, they made such earnest sute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much a doe) they obteyned, that the affaires of the citie might be put into *Phocion*s handes & gouernment.

He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moued that the cite of ATHENS should enter into the common treatie of peace, & common assembly of the states of GREECE, procured at king Philip request: Phocion would not agree to it, vnill they might vnderstand what demands Philip would make at the assembly of the GREECIANS. When his opinion through the perversities of time could not be liked of them, & that he saw the ATHENIANS soone after repented them that they did not followe his counsell, when they heard they should furnish king Philip with shippes and horsemen; then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withstand that, which now ye haue consented vnto. But sithence it is so that you haue nowe past your consents, you must be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembering that your auncelors in times past haue sometye commaunded, and other while obeyed others, and yet haue so wisely and discretely gouerned them selues in both fortunes, that they haue not onely saued their cite, but all GREECE besides. When newes came of king Philip's death, the people for ioy would straight haue made bonfires and sacrifices to the goddesses for the good newes: but Phocion would not suffer them, and sayd, that it was a token of a base minde, to ioyce at any mans death, & besides that, the armie which ouerthrew you at CHERONEA, hath not yet lost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speake ill of Alexander, and specially when he was so neare THEBES with his armie: Phocion rehearsed vnto him these verses of Homer:

How great a folly is it for to stand Against a cruell king,

Which beeing armed and hauing sword in hand, Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is such a great fire kindled, wilt thou cast the cite into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not suffer them to cast them selues away: for to that ende haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernment. And afterwards also, when Alexander had raised the cite of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demosthenes, Lycargus, Hyperides, and Caridemus, and that the whole assembly and counsell not knowing what answer to make, did all cast their eyes vpon Phocion, and cryed vnto him to say his opinion: he then rose vppe, and taking one of his friends vnto him called Nicoles, whome he loued and trusted aboue all men els, he sayd thus openly vnto them. These men whome Alexander requireth, haue brought this cite to this extremitie, that if he required Nicoles here, I would giue my consent to deliuer him: For I would thinke my selfe happy to lose my life, for all your safetie. Furthermore, though I am right hartely sory (sayd he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the cite for succour: yet I assure ye, it is better one cite mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is best to intreape the Conqueror for both, rather then to our certaine destruction to fight with him that is the stronger. It is sayd also that Alexander refused the first decree which the people offered him vpon Phocion's request, and sent away the Ambassadors, and would not speake with them. But the second, which Phocion him selfe brought, he tooke: beeing tolde by his fathers olde seruants, that king Philip made great account of him. Wherevpon, Alexander did not onely giue him audience, and graunt his request, but further followed his counsell. For Phocion perswaded him, if he loued quietnes to leaue warre: if he desired fame, then that he should make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GREECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humor with such talke and discourse as he thought would like him best: he lo altered and softened Alexanders disposition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS should looke to their affayres, for if he should dye, he knewe no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, because he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend: he made so much of him, that he more honored him, then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Darius the historiographer writeth, that when Alexander was growen very great, and had ouercome king Darius: he left out of his letters this worde Charin (to wit, ioy, and health) which he vsed commonly in all the letters he wrote, and would no more honor any other with that maner of salutation, but Phocion, & Antipater. Chares also writeth the same. And they

the Athenians, by Phoci-on's meanes.

As they all doe confesse, that Alexander sent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundred silver talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him such a great reward, aboue all the other Citizens of ATHENS. Bicause, sayd they, he onely esteemeth thee to be a good, and honest man. Phocion replied againe, then let him giue me leaue to be that I seeeme, & am, while I liue. The messengers would not so leaue him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandrie, & thriftines: For they found his wife her selfe baking, and he him selfe drew water before them, out of the well, to wash his feete. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings present, and were offended with him, saying it was a shame for Alexanders friend to liue so miserably and beggerly as he did. Then Phocion seeing a poore old man goe by, in a threed bare gowne, asked them, whether they thought him worse then he? No, God forbid, answered they againe. Then replied he againe, he liues with lesse then I do, and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be short, said he, if I should take this summe of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other side, if I occupy it, I shall make all the cite speake ill of the king and me both. So this great present was sent backe from ATHENS, whereby he shewed the GREECIANS, that he was richer than needed not such golde & silver, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote againe vnto Phocion, that he did not reckon them his friends, that would take nothing of him: Phocion notwithstanding would not take the money, but onely requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at libertie, which were kept prisoners in the cite of SARDIS, for certaine accusations layde against them: Echeeratus the Rhetorician, Athenodorus borne in the cite of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demetrius and Spartus. Alexander presently set them at libertie, and sent Craterus into MACEDON, commaunding him to giue Phocion the choyce of one of these foure cities off ASIA, which he liked best: CIOS, GERGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELIA: sending him worde, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuse this offer, then he was at the first. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after dyed. Phocion's house is seene yet at this day in the village of MELITTA, set forth with plates of copper; but otherwise very meane, and without curiositie. For his wiues he married, there is no mention made of the first, sauing that Cephisodorus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife, she was no lesse famous at ATHENS, for her honestie, and good housewifuerie: then Phocion, for his iustice and equitie. And for prooffe thereof, it is reported, that the ATHENIANS being one day assembled in the Theater, to see newe tragedies played, one of the players when he shoulde haue comen vpon the scaffolde, to haue played his parte, asked the setter forth of the playes, the apparell of a Queene; and certaine Ladies to wayte vpon her, because he was to playe the parte of the Queene. The setter forth of the playes denying him, the player went away in a rage; and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cryed out vnto him: Dost thou not see Phocions wife, that goeth vppe and downe the cite, with one mayde onely wayting on her? and wilt thou playe the foole, and marre the modestie of the women of ATHENS? The people hearing his wordes, filled all the Theater with ioye and clapping of handes. The same Ladye, when a certaine gentlewoman of ILONIA came to ATHENS to see her, and shewed her all her riche iewells and precious stones she had: she answered her agayne, all my riches and iewells, is my husband Phocion; who these twenty yeares together, hath continually beene choosen generall for the ATHENIANS. Phocion's sonne telling his father on a tyme, that he was desirous to contend with other younge men for the victorie, who should cunninglyest leape out, and gette vppe agayne into the charretts or coaches, running their full courie, at the feastes Panathenaeas at ATHENS: his father was contented he shoulde, not that he was desirous his sonne shoulde haue the honor of the victorie, but bicause by this honest exercise he should growe to better manner; for that he was a dissolute younge man, and much giuen to wine. Yet he wanne the victorie at that tyme; and there were diuers of his fathers friends, that prayed him to doe them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victorie in their houses. Phocion denyed them all, but one man; and him he suffered to shewe his good will vnto his house, and went thither him selfe to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweete smelling spices to washe the feete of the bydden guesstes as they came to the feast: Whereupon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, howe canst thou abyde Phocion, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victorie with excess? But because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there amonge younge boyes brought vpp after the LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne contrie manner and facions. Also when Demades the Orator one daye sayde vnto Phocion: why doe we not perswade the ATHENIANS to liue after the LACONIAN manner? As for me (sayde he) if thou wilt make one to sette it forward: I am ready to be the first man to moue the matter. In deede, Phocion, thou art a meete man to perswade the ATHENIANS to liue LACONIAN like, in common together at their meales, and to prayse Lycurgus straight lawe: that art thy selfe commonly so persumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another tyme when Alexander wrote letters vnto ATHENS to sende him some shippes, and that the Orators perswaded them not to graunt him, the people called vpon Phocion chiefly to saye his opinion: then Phocion tolde them plainly, me thinks ye must eyther make your selues the strongest in warres, or beinge the weaker, procure to be friendes vnto the stronger. Pythias, a newcome Orator, beinge full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speake in euery matter: Wherefore Phocion sayde vnto him, good goddes, will this noues neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenent of the prouince of BABYLON, fledde out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with a great summe of golde and siluer: straight these men that solde their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a figne of swallows. And he stucke not to giue euery one of them a peece of money to baste them with: for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion him selfe, he sent vnto him seuen hundred talents, and offered him selfe and all that he had into his bandes of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe aunswer, and tolde him, that he woulde make him repent it, if he corrupted the cite of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus beinge amared therewith, left him at that tyme, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIANS late in counsell about him, he perceived that those which had taken his money, were thronge from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should haue excused him, to bleere the world, that men should not suspecte them they had beene corrupted; and that Phocion on thother side which had refused his money, hauing respect to the common wealth, had also some regarde to saue his life: he once more attempted all the wayes he could to wyne him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could cary the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendship with Charicles (Phocions sonne in lawe) he made him to beill spoken of, and greatly suspected, because men sawe that he trusted him in all things, and employed him in all his assayres. As, in committing to his trust the making of a sumptuous tombe for Pythias, the famous Curisan that was deade, whom he loued, and by whome he had a Daughter: the taking upon him whereof was no lesse shame vnto Charicles, then the finishing thereof was disgrace vnto him. This tombe is seene vnto this daye in a place called Hermium, in the hie waye from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workman shippes thereof beinge nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Charicles, for the finishing of the same. Furthermo, after Harpalus death, Charicles and Phocion tooke his Daughter, and carefully brought her vpp. Afterwards also, Charicles beinge accused for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he besought his father in lawe Phocion, to helpe to ease him in his iudgement. But Phocion flatly denyed him, and sayde: Charicles, I tooke thee for my sonne in lawe, in all honest and iust causes onely. Furthermore, when Alepiades, the sonne of Hipparchus, brought the first newes of the deathe of Kinge Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleue him: for, sayde he, if it were true, all the earthe woulde smell of the saour of his corse. Phocion then perceyuing the people beganne to bee highe minded, and sought innouation: he went about to brydle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators gotte vpp

At the pulpit for orations, and cryed out, that Alepiades newes were true of Alexander: deathe: well then, Phocion, if it bee true to daye, it shall be true also to morrowe, and the next day after. And therefore my Maisters, bee not too hasty, but thinke of it at better leysure, and sette your assayres at a sure staye. When Leosthenes also by his practise had brought the cite of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES warre, and in skorne asked Phocion, that was offended at it, what good he had done to the common wealth so many yeares together as he had beene Generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion answered him, no small good, sayde he, for all my contrye men haue beene buried at home in their owne graues. Another tyme Leosthenes speaking proudly and insolently to the people, Phocion one daye sayde vnto him: younge man my friende, thy wordes are lyke to a Cypres tree, which is highe and greate, but beareth no frute. Then Hyperides rising vpp, asked Phocion: when wilt thou then counsell the ATHENIANS to make warre? when I shall see younge men, sayde he, not forsake their ranks, tiche men liberall, and Orators leaue to robbe the common wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to see suche a goodly greate armie as Leosthenes had leauied: and that they asked Phocion howe he lyked it. A goodly armie, Phocion, for a furlonge, but I feare their returne; and the continuance of this warre: for I doe not see the cite able to make any more money, nor moe shippes; neyther yet any moe fouldiers than these. The which proued true, as it fell out afterwards: For at the first, Leosthenes did notable exploits. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the cite of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in suche a hope and iolitie, that they made continuall feastes and sacrifices through the cite, to thanke the gods for these good newes. And there were some amongst them, that to take Phocion in a trippie, asked him if he did not wish that he had done all those things? yes in deede, answered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counsell to haue done them. Another tyme also when letters came, dayly, one after another, bringing good newes, good gods, sayde he, when shall we leaue to ouercome. When Leosthenes was deade in this voyage, they that feared Phocion shoulde bee appoynted Capayne in his place, and that he woulde pacifie the warre: did thrust in a man of meane hatur, and unknown, that sayde in the assemblie, he was Phocions friende and schoolefellowe, and therefore besought the people that they woulde spare Phocion, because they had not suche another man as he; and that they woulde make Antipater Generall of their armie. The people were contented withall. But then Phocion stood vpp, and sayde, that this man was neuer schooller with him, neyther did he euer knowe him before that tyme: but now sayde he; from henceforth I will take thee for my friende, for thou hast giuen the people the best counsell for me. The people notwithstanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion spake agaynst it all he coude. Thereupon, his friendes bidding him beware of suche speeches; howe he did offende the people, least they killed him: he answered them, they shall wrongfully put me to death; Phocion, speaking for the benefite of my contrye, but otherwise they shall haue reason to doe it, if I speake to the contrarye. But when he sawe nothing woulde pacifie them, and that they went on still with their intent: then he commaunded the Herald to proclaim by sounde of tromper, that all Citizens from foureteene yeares to thre score, able to cary weapon, shoulde presently vpon breaking vp of thassembly, arme themselves, and followe him with fve dayes prouision for vittells. Then was there greate sturte amonge them in the cite, and the olde men came and complained vnto him: for his ouer straight commaundement. He tolde them agayne, I doe you no wronge: for I am foure score my selfe, and yet will goe with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that tyme, and quenched their fond desire of warre. But when all the sea coast was full of fouldiers; both of the MACEDONIANS, and other straungers which were ledde by Attilus their Captain; that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNYS; and spoyled the countrey thereabouts: then Phocion ledde the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuers taking vpon them the Office of a Lieutenent, and going about to counsell him, some to lodge his campe ypon such a hill, and others to send his horsemen to such a place, and others to campe here. O Hercules, Phocion, how many Capitaines doe I see, and how fewe fouldiers? Afterwards when he had set his footemen in battell raye, there was one amongst them that left his rancke, and stepped A out before them all. Thereupon one of his enemies also made towards him, to fight with him: but the A THENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe againe to his place. Then sayd Phocion vnto him: art thou not ashamed young lowte to haue forsaken thy rancke twice? the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddest placed thy selfe? So Phocion giuing charge apon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and slue Micion their Captaine, with diuers others. Furthermore, the armie of the G RECIANS being at that time in THESALY, wanne a battell against Antipater, and Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was slaine in the field, Antiphilus being general of the footemen, and Menon T HESSALIAN, Colonell of the horsemen. Shortly after, Craterus coming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great armie, they fought a battell by the citie of CRANON, where the G RECIANS were ouerthrowen: yet was not the ouerthrowe nor slaughter greate, although it came through the disobedience of the soldiers to their Captaines, which were but young men, and vsed them ouer gently. Moreover, when Antipater practised to make their cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and shamefully forooke to defend their common libertie: Whereupon Antipater marched forth with his armie, to the citie of A THENS. Demosthenes and Hyperides vnderstanding that, forooke the citie. Then Demades, that was in disgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of such fines as were set vpon his head (being seuen severall times condemned, because he had so many tymes moued matters contrary to the law) and could not therefore be suffered any more to speake in the assembly, was then dispensed withall, and licenced to speake: whereupon he moued the people to send Ambassadors vnto Antipater, with full commission & authoritie to treat with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans trust this absolute authoritie to treat of peace: they called for Phocion, saying, that he onely was to be trusted with the ambassade. Then Phocion answered them: if you had beleueed my former counsell I alwaies gaue you, such weighty matters should not now haue troubled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by the people, Phocion was sent Ambassador vnto Antipater, that laye then in the castell of Cadmea, being ready at that time to invade the contrye of ATTICA. Phocion first requested him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the A THENIANS. Craterus presently answered him: Phocion, thy request is vnreasonable, that lying here we should ease out our friendes, and destroy their contry: when we may liue of our enemies, and enrich our selues with their spoyle. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, tolde him: we must needs doe Phocion this pleasure. And for the rest, touching the capitulations of peace, he willed that the A THENIANS should send them a blanke, and referre the condicions of peace vnto them: like as he him selfe being beleaged in the citie of LAMIA, had referred all capitulations and articles of peace, vnto the discretion of Leosthenes their generall. So when Phocion was come backe to A THENS, the A THENIANS seeing there was no remedie, were compelled to be contented with such offer of peace, as the enemye made them. Then Phocion was sent backe againe to Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors ioyned in commission with him: amongst whom also, was that famous Philosopher Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man so prowd, cruel, disdainfull, nor hasty E of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would soften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him. But yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerse nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the rest, & would not once salute Xenocrates. Whereupon, some say, that Xenocrates said then: Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a wimes of the discurtellie and euill he meaneth vnto the A THENIANS. So when Xenocrates beganne to speake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the ende commaunded him to holde his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater answered them: that he would make peace with the A THENIANS, so they deliuered him Demosthenes and Hyperides: that they should keepe their auncient lawes and gouernment, that they should receive a garrison into the haven of Munichia, that they should defray the charges of this warre, and also paye a ranfome besides. All the other Ambassadors but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these condicions of peace, as very reasonable and fauourable: but he sayde, that

A that for slaues, Antipater did handle them fauorably: but for free men, he delt too hardly with them. Then Phocion besought him that he would yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is sayde) answered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, sa- uing that which should vndoe thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that An- tipater sayd not so, but asked him, if he would become surtiet for the A THENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the articles and condicions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrison. Phocion then holding his peace, & delaying answer, there was one Callimedes furnished Carabos, (a bolde man, and hated the libertie of the people) that brake forth in these words: if Phocion were so fond to giue his word for the A THENIANS, wouldest thou, Antipater, beleue him therefore, and leaue to doe that thou hast determined? Thus B were the A THENIANS driue to receive the garrison of the MACEDONIANS, of the which Menyllus was captaine, an honest man, and Phocians friend. This commaundement to receive the garrison within the haven of Munichia, was found very stately, and done by Antipater, rather of a vaine glory to boast of his power: then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the castell, he further increased their griefe: because the garrison entred the twenty day of Boedromion (to wit, the moneth of August) on the which the feast day of their militaries was celebrated, at what time they make their proces- sion called Iacchus, from the citie of A THENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therefore the solemnitie of this holy feast being thus confused, many beganne to consider, that in olde tyme when their Realme did flourish, there were heard and seene voyces and images of the goddes on that day, which made the enemies both afraid, and amazed: and nowe in contrary manner, in the very selfe same solemnitie of the gods, they sawe the greatest calamitie that could haue hap- pened vnto G RECE. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yere through before, became then too prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and euent, that euer happened vnto the G RECIANS, which was, the losse of their libertie. For not many yeares before, there was brought an oracle from DODONA vnto A THENS: that they shoulde looke well to the rockes of DIANA, that straungers shoulde not possesse them. And about that tyme also, the couerings with the which they doe adorne the holy beddes of the mysteries, beinge wetted with water, became from a purple culler which they had before, to looke yellowe and pale, as it had bene the couering of a deade bodie. Yea, and that which was most to bee won- dered at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and put- ting them in the same water, they did without changing keepe their culler they had before. When one of the Ministers of the temple also did washe a litle pygge in the sea, in a cleane place by the wharfe: there sodainly came a greatesse the that byte at it, and caryed the hin- der partes of the pygge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured, that the goddes did signifie vnto them, that they should lose the lowest parte of their citie nearest to the sea, and should keepe the highest partes thereof. This notwithstanding, the garrison did not of- fend nor trouble the A THENIANS, because of the honestie of their Captaine Menyllus. Nowe there were about twelue thousand Citizens; that for their poetrie lost the benefit of their freedome: of the which, parte of them remayned at A THENS, vnto whom it seemed, they E offered great wronge and iniurie: and parte of them also went into THRACIA, where Anti- pater assigned them townes and landes to inhabit. They seemed to be menlike vnto them that had bene taken by assaulte, or by seerge within a citie, which had bene compelled to forsake their contrie. Furthermore, the shameful death of Demosthenes in the Ile of CA- LAVRIA, and of HYPERIDES, by the citie of CELONES, (whereof we haue written hereto- fore) were almost occasion giuen them to lament the tymes of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was slayne, they that had ouercomen him, were so cruell vnto their subiectes: that a laborer in the contrie of PHRYGIA digging the earthe, beinge asked what he sought for, answered, sighing: I seeke for Antigonus. Then many men beganne to say as much, when they remembered the noble mindes of those F two great Princes, howe mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their dis- pleasure: not like Antipater, who craftily cloyed his tyrannicall power which he vsurped, by beeing famillier, going simply appparelled, and faring meanelly: and yet showed him selfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lorde and tyrant vnto them whome he had ouercome. A Neuertheles, Phocion obtayned of him the restoring agayne of diuers men, whome he had banished: and those whome he could not gette to bee restored, yet he procured that they shoulde not be banished into so farre contries, as others which had bene sent beyonde the Mountaines Acroceranians, and the head of Tanarus out of Greece, but that they had libertie to remayne within the contrie of Peloponnesus: amonge the which, was one Agonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remayned in Athens with great iustice and lenitie, and such as he knewe to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to some office: but such as he sawe were fantastike people, and desirous of chaunge, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished awaye of them selues, and learned in tyme to loue the contrye, and to followe tilage. When he sawe Xenocrates also paye a certeine pension or tribute to the common wealth, which all straungers dwelling in Athens diuide yearly to paye: he woulde haue made him a free man, and offered to put his name amongst the number of free Citizens. But Xenocrates refused it, saying, he woulde haue no parte of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof, he had bene sent Ambassador. And when Menyllus had sent Phocion money, he made him answer: that Menyllus was no greater Lorde then Alexander had bene, neyther had he at that tyme any greater occasion to receyue his present, then when he had refused King Alexanders gyfte. Menyllus replying agayne, sayde: that if he had no neede of it for him selfe, yet he might let his sonne Phocion haue it. But Phocion answered: if my sonne Phocion will leaue his naughtie lyfe, and become an honest man, that which I will leaue him, shall serue his turne very well: but if it bee so that he will still holde on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. An other tyme also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he woulde haue had him done an vnholiest thinge: Antipater, sayde he, can not haue me his friende, and flatterer both. Antipater selfe was wont to saye, that he had two friendes in Athens, Phocion and Demades: of the which, he coulde neuer make the one to take any thinge of him, and the other, he coulde neuer satisfie him. And truly Phocions poeurye was a greates glorie of his vertue, sythe he was growen olde, continuing in the same, after he had bene so many tymes generall of the Athenians, and had receyued suche friendshippe and curtesie, of so many Kinges and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarye delighted to shewe his riches in D things that were contrarye to the lawes of the cite. For, a decree beeing made at Athens, commanding that no straunger, vpon forfeiture of a thousand Drachmas to bee payed by the defrayer of the daunces to the cite, shoulde bee any of the Dauncers that daunced at any common playes or sportes: Demades one daye making certeyne games and sportes at his owne charges, brought a hundred Dauncers of straungers at one tyme, and with all, brought also a hundred thousand Drachmas to paye the forfeiture thereof. Another tyme when he maryed his sonne Demas, he sayde vnto him: sonne, when I maryed thy mother, there was so small roste, that my next neighbour knewe not of it: where now at thy maryage, Kinges and Princes are at the charge of the scalfe. Furthermore, when the Athenians were importunate with Phocion to goe to Antipater, to intreate him to take E his garrison out of their cite: he still refused the ambassade, eyther bycause he had no hope to obtayne it, or for that he sawe the people more obedient vnto reason, for feare of the garrison. Howebeit he obtayned of Antipater, that he shoulde not bee too hastye in demanding of his money, but shoulde deferre it tyll a further tyme. So the Athenians perceiuing they could doe no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter vpon him, and went with his sonne into Maccedon, whether doubtles his destinie caried him to his vtter destruction, euen at that very tyme when Antipater was fallen sicke of a discaise whereof he dyed: Whereby the affayres of the Realme went through the handes of Cassander his sonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had sent vnto Antigonius in Asia, willing him to come in all possible speede to winne Greece and Maccedon, F which hong but of an old rotte threde, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherefore Cassander being aduertised of his arrival, he made him presently to be apprehended, & setting his sonne hard

A hard by him, slue him before his father, so neere him, that the blood of his sonne sprang vpon him: so that the father was all bloodied with the murder of his sonne. Then Cassander calling in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treason against his father, geuing him all the reproachfull words he could deuise: at the length he slue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death, had established Polyperchon General of the armie of the Maccedoni-ans, & Cassander his sonne, only Colonell of a thousand footemen. He notwithstanding, after his fathers decease, taking vpon him the gouernment of the realme: sent Nicanor with speede: to succede Menyllus in the Captaine ship of the garrison of Athens, before his death shoulde be reuealed, commanding him first in any case, to take the castell of Munychia, which he did. Shorly after, the Athenians vnderstanding of the death of Antipater, they accused Phocion, for that he had known of his death long before, and yet kept it secret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not this accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor: whom he handled so wisely, that he made him not only frendly vnto the Athenians, but furthermore perswaded him to be at some charge to geue the people the pastime of common playes, which he made to be done at his cost. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings person, meaning to geue Cassander a stampant and blurt, he sent letters pattentes vnto the people at Athens, declaring how the young king did restore vnto them their popular state againe, and commanded that all the Athenians should vie their former auncient lawes of their cite. This was a vile & craftie fetch against Phocion. For Polyperchon desiring this practise to get the city of Athens into his hands (as it fel out afterwards C by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, vnles he found meanes first to banish Phocion: and thought that he shoulde easily bring that to passe, when suche as had before bene put of their freedom, by his meanes, should come againe to haue voyces in thassembly, and that the seditious Orators and accusers might be turned at liberty againe, to say what they woulde. The Athenians hauing heard the contentes of these letters pattentes, beganne to be somewhat quickened, and moued with all: whereupon Nicanor desiring to speake with the Athenians in their Senate, which was assembled in the haue of Piræa: he went and hazarded his person amongst them, upon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being secretly aduertised thereof, and in the field, not farre from the cite, did what he could: to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in tyme, saued him selfe. Then it appeared, that Nicanor would presently be reuenged of the cite, and they accused Phocion because he kept him not, but did let him goe. Whereunto he answered: that he trusted Nicanors word, and that he did not thinke he would offer the cite any hurt, but if it should fall out otherwise, he had rather the world should know, that he had the wrong offered him, then that he should offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly spoken, in respect of him selfe. But considering that he being then General, did thereby hazard the safety of his contrie: I can not tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had, to the safety of his contriemen. Neither coulde he also alleage for his excuse, that he did not laye handes on Nicanor, for feare to bring the city into manifest warre: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had sworne and promised vnto him, and the iustice that he would obserue in his behalfe: that for E his sake, Nicanor should afterwards keepe him selfe in peace, and doe no hurte to the Athenians. Howebeit in troth it seemed, that nothing deceived Phocion: but by the ouer trust he had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, because when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he sought all the secret meanes he coulde to surpris the haue of Piræa, and that he dayly passed ouer souldiers in the Ile of Salamina, and practised to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the haue: he would neuer heare of it, and muche lesse beleue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes Lamprian made a motion, that the Athenians should prepare to be in readines to waite upon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commanded them: he made no account of it, vntill he saw Nicanor come out with his souldiers from the fort of Munychia, and that he beganne to cast trenches to compasse in the ha F uen of Piræa. But then, when Phocion thought to lead out the people to preuent him: he found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commaundement. In the meane time, Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon came with an armie, pretending to aide them of the cite against Nicanor, where in deede he meint (if he could) to get the rest of the city into his hands. A then specially, when they were in greatest broile one against an other, and the rather, because the banished men entred hand other head with him, and diuers strangers also, and other defamed men: so that there was a confused counsell and assembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order, in the which Phocion was deprived of his office of General, and others were also chosen Captaines in his place. And had they not seene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the wallies of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS affrayed and mistrustfull: they had neuer saued it from taking. At that time Phocion was presently accused of treason by the Orator Agonides: the which Callimedes and Pericles fearing, got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion also with his friends that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom also Solon PLATYAN, and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN, went for company, who thought to haue found frendshipp and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling sicke by the way, in the citie of ELATIA, they stayed there many dayes, hoping of his recouerie. But in the meane time, the people at the perswasion of the Orator Agonides, and at the request of Archeistrates, stablished a decree, to sende Ambassadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuse Phocion: inasmuch as both parties met at one selfe time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the contrie of PHOCIE, called PHARYGES, standing at the foote of the mountaine Acronion, which they surname also Galaten. There Polyperchon commaunded a cloth of gold to be set vp, and caused the king to be set vnder the same, and all his chieffest frendes about him. But to beginne withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commaunded them to put him to death after they had racked him: C then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to say. Then they beganne to quarrell, and to be lowde one with an other, accusing one an other in the presence of the king and his counsell: vntill Agonides at length stepped forth, and sayd: my Lordes of MACEDON, puts all in prison, then send vs bound handes and feete to ATHENS, to geue account of our doinges. The king laughed to heare him say so. But the noble men of MACEDON that were present then, and diuers strangers besides to heare their complaints: made signe to the Ambassadors to viter their accusations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did still cut of his tale, as he thought to purge him selfe: inasmuch as in anger, he beat his staffe he had in his hand against the ground, and commaunded him at length to hold his peace, & to get him thence. And when Hegemon also told Polyperchon, that he him selfe could best witnesse, howe Phocion had alwayes faithfully serued and loued the people: he angrily answered him, come not hether to lye falsely vpon me, in the presence of the king. Therewith the king rose out of his seate, and tooke a speare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon: had not Polyperchon sodainly embraced him behinde, and stayed him. So the counsell rose, and brake vp, but presently Phocion was apprehended, and they that stood by him. Certaine of his friends seeing that, which stood further of, misseled their faces, and straight conueyed them selues away. The rest were sent prisoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not so muche to haue their causes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carying of them to ATHENS was shameful. F For they were caried vpon carres through the great streete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clitus kept them, vntill the Senate had assembled the people, excepting no bondman, no stranger, nor defamed person out of this assemble, but left the Theater wide open to all comers in whatsoever they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euery man that would speake against them. So first of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduerse the people, that he had found the offenders conuicted of treason: notwithstanding, that he referred the sentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were free men. Then Clitus brought his prisoners before the people, where the noble men when they saw Phocion, were affrayed, and hiding their faces, wept to see him. Howbeit, there was one that rose vp, and sayd: my Lordes sith the king referreth the iudgement of so great persons E vnto the people, it were great reason all the bondmen and strangers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, should be taken out of this assemble. The people would not agree to it, but cried

A cried out, that such traitors should be stoned to death, that fauor the authoritie of a few, and ate enemies of the people: whereupon silence was made, and no man durst speake any more for Phocion. Neuertheless when Phocion with muche a doe had obteyned audience, he asked them: my Lordes, will ye iustly, or wrongfully put vs to death? Some answered him: iustly. Howe then can ye doe it, & he, that will not heare our iustificacions? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming neerer, sayd vnto them. For my selfe, my Lordes, I confesse I haue done you wrong, & haue in gouernment committed faults deseruing death: but for these prisoners with me, what haue they done, why you shoulde put them to death? The common people answered him: because they are thy frends. With this answer Phocion departed, and spake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agonides holding a decree in his hand ready wrytten, red it openly to the people, declaring how they should be iudged by voyces, whether the offenders had deserued death or not: and if it were found they had, then that they should all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was red, cried out, that they should adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion should be put to death, they should first torment him: & therewithall commaundement was geuen that the wheele should be sette vp to breake his ioints apon it, and also that the hangman should be sent for. But then Agonides perceiving that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking besides it were too beastly and barbarous a parte to vse him in that sorte, he sayd openly: my Lordes, when you shall haue such a varlet in your handes as Callimedes, then you may cast him on the wheele: but against Phocion, I would not with such cruelty. Then rose vp a noble man among them, and added to his words: thou hast reason to say so, Agonides: for if Phocion should be layed on the wheele, what should we then doe with thee? The decree being confirmed, according to the contents thereof, iudgement was geuen by voyces of the people, no man fitting but all standing vp, and most of them with garlandes on their heades, for the ioy they had to condemne these prisoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned, Nicoles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pythocles: but Demetrius PALERIAN, Callimedes, and Chariletes, were also in their absence condemned to dye. Now when the assembly was broken vp, and that the persons condemned were caried backe to prison, from thence to be conueyed to execution: others imbracing their frends, and taking their last leaue of them as they went, wept, and lamented their cursed fortune. But Phocion looking as cheerefully of it as he was wont to doe being General, when D they honorably waited on him to his house, from the assembly: he made many of them pitie him in their hearts, to consider his constancie, and noble corage. On thother side also, there were many of his enemies that came as neere vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongst whom there was one that stepped before him, and did spit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magistrates, sayd: will you not cause this impudent fellow to leaue his rayling? When they were in prison, Thudippus seeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a mortar to geue them to drinke: he beganne desperately to curse and banne, saying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, sayd Phocion againe: and doost thou not rather reioyce to dye with me? When one that stood by asked Phocion, if he would any thing to his sonne Phocus: yes, & he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then E Nicoles one of Phocions dearest frendes, prayed him to let him drinke the poyson before him. Phocion answered him, thy request is grieuous to me, Nicoles: but because I neuer denyed thee any thing in my life, I wil also graunt thee this at my death. When all the rest had dronke, there was no more poyson left, and the hangman sayd he would make no more vlesse they gaue him twelue Drachmas, for so much the pound did cost him. Phocion perceiving the that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his frends vnto him, and prayed him to geue the hangman that litle money he demanded, sith a man can not dye at ATHENS for nothing, without cost. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, Marche) on which day the Knights were wont to make a solemne procession in the honor of Iupiter: howbeit some of them left of the garlandes of flowers which they shoulde haue worn on their F heades, and others also looking towards the prison dore as they went by, burst out a weeping. For, they whose hearts were not altogether hardned with cruelty, & whose iudgements were not wholly suppressed with enuie, thought it a grieuous sacriledge against the goddess, that they did not let that day passe, but that they did defile so solemne a feast, with the violent death of a man. His enemies notwithstanding, continuing still their anger against him, made the people passe a decree, that his bodie should be banished, and caried out of the bondes of the contry of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire should be made for the solemnising of his funeralls. For this respect no friend of his durst once touch his body. Howbeit a poore man called Comopion, that was wont to get his living that way, being hyered for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corse, and caried it beyond the city of ELEUSIN, and getting fire out of a womans house of MEGARA, he solemnised his funeralls. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who comming by chance that way, with her gendemen, where his body was but newly burnt: she caused the earth to be cast vp a litle where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, whereupon she did vse such sprinklings and effusions, as are commonly done at the funeralls of the dead: & then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, she brought them home, and buried them in her harth, saying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his auncesters, when the ATHENIANS shall come to confesse the fault & wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardnes of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iustice, and honesty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be set vp in brasse, and gaue honorable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accusers, they condemned Agnonides of treason, and put him to death them selues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwards met with by his sonne Phocion, who was reuenged of them. This Phocion as men reporte, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawde kept, comming by chance one day into the schoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that beleued not there were any goddes) make this argument. If it be no shame, sayd he, to deliuer a mans friend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeeme his leman which he loueth: euen so it is all one to redeeme a mans leman, as his frende. This young man taking this argument to serue his turne, beleuing that he might lawfully doe it, got the young maide he loued from the bawde. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GREGIANS; for men thought that it was a like hairous offence and calamitie vnto the citie of ATHENS.

THE LIFE OF Cato Vtican.

THe family and house of Cato, tooke his first glorie and name of his great grandfather, Cato the Censor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famoussest and worthiest men of ROMA in his time. This Cato whom we nowe wryte of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Cepio, and Porcia his sister. Servilia was also Catoes halfe sister, by his mothers side. All these were brought vp with their vncke Lucius Drusus, at that time the greatest man of the citie: for he was passing eloquent, and verie honest, and of as great a courage besides, as any other ROMANE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed him selfe both in word and countenance, and also in all his pastimes and recreations, verie constant, and stable. For he would goe through with that he tooke upon him to doe, and would force him selfe about his strength: and as he could not away with flatterers, so was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh, and yet had euer a pleasaunt countenance. He was not chollerike, nor easie to be angred: but when the blood was vp, he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to schoole, he was verie dull of vnderstanding, and slow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men else commonly doe. For such as are quicke of conceits, haue commonly the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, doe keepe that better which they haue learned. For euery kind of learning is a motion and quickening of the minde. He seemed besides not to be light of credit, & that may be some cause of his slownes in conceits. For truly he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that haue least reason to resist, are those which doe giue lightest credit. For young men are easely persuaded then old men, and the sicke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his doubts: there he is soonest brought to beleue any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported that Cato was obedient vnto his schoolemaister, and would doe what he commanded him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of euery thing. In deede his schoolemaister was very gentle, and readier to reach him, then to strike him with his fist. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of ITALIA which were confederates of the ROMANS, sued to be made free citizens of ROMA. At that time it chaunted one Pompeius Silo, a valliant souldier, and of great estimation among the confederats of the ROMANS, and a great friend besides of Drusus: to be lodged many dayes at his house. He A in this time falling acquainted with these young boyes, sayd one day vnto them: good boyes, intreate your vncle to speake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of ROME. Capio smiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no answer, looked very wisely upon the strangers that lay in the house. Then Pompedius, taking him aside, asked him: and thou, my pretie boy, what sayest thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle, as well as thy brother, to be good to his guesstes? Cato still held his peace, and answered nothing, but shewed by his silence and looke, that he would not heare their request. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would haue let him haue gone: and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his armes without the window, and sayd, promise vs then, or else I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinned for it, nor shewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompedius letting him downe againe, told his friends that stood by him: O what good happe doth this child promise one day vnto TRAIAN, if he liue? sure if he were a man, I beleue we should not haue one voice of all the people of our side. An other time, there were some of Catoes neere kinsmen, that keeping the feast day of his birth, had many young boyes to supper, & amongst others this Cato. The boyes to occupie them selues till supper was ready, gathered them selues together great and small, into some priuate place of the house. Their play was, counterfeiting pleadings before the iudges, accusing one an other, and carying them that were condemned to prison. Amongst them, a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bounde as a condemned person. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cried out vnto Cato C who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the chamber dore and putting them by force that withstood him to come vnto it, he tooke out the young boy, and caried him very angrily with him to his owne house, and all the other young boyes followed him also. So Cato had such name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of young boyes running a horsebacke, which the ROMANS call Troia to appoint them before that they might be ready at the day of the show, he hauing gotten all the young boyes of noble houses together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, because of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the great, neither would they be exercised vnder him, nor follow him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cried then Cato, and D Sextus him selfe did willingly geue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers friend, and therefore did send for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnes he shewed to few men, for the maiestie and great authority he had. Serpedo also (Catoes schoolemaister) thinking it a great preferment and safetie for his schollers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllas house, to waite vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a tayle or prison, for the great number of prisoners which were dayly brought thither, and put to death: Cato being then but foureteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heades brought which were sayed to be of great men, and that euery bodie sighed and mourned to see them: he asked his schoolemaister, how it was possible the tyrant escaped, that some one or other killed him not? Because, Serpedo, that all men feare him, more E then they hate him. Why then, replied Cato againe, diddest thou not geue me a sword that might kill him, to deliuer my contry of this slavery and bondage? Serpedo hearing the boy say so, and seeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choller, he maruelled muche at it, and afterwards had a very good eye vnto him, least rashly he should attempt some thing against Sylla. When he was but a litle boy, some asked him whom he loued best? My brother, sayd he. Then the other continuing still to aske him, & who next he answered likewise, his brother. Then the third time againe, likewise his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him so oft. Yea and when he was comen of age also, he then confirmed the loud he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer supped without his brother Capio, neither went he euer out of his house into the market place, nor into the fields F without him: but when his brother did noynt him selfe with sweete oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things else, he led a straight and hard life. So that his brother

Capio

A Capio being commended of euery man for his temperance, honesty, and sober life: he grained in deede that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life: but when I doe (sayd he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinks then there is no difference betwixt me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apollones Priest, he went from his brother and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the summe of a hundred and twentie talentes. Then he liued more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance with Antipater TRAIAN, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue him selfe chiefly vnto the studie of morall and ciuill Philosophie, imbracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was prickt forward by some god: but about all other vertues, he loued the B severity of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauor. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, because he would there should be certain warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philosophie, as also in a great cite. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in company: it skilleth no matter, Capio he, so they can not reprove my life, for I will beginne to speake, when I can say some thing worthy to be spoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the cite, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes went to keepe their audience: and because there was a pillar that troubled their C seats, they would either haue taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to goe into the market place, and to gett vp into the pulpit for orations, to speake against them: where hauing geuen this first proofe of his eloquence and noble minde, he was maruelously esteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeiting finenes of speache and affectation, but stout, full of wit and vehemency: and yet in the shortnes of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruelously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine grauities besides, it did to please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruelous number of people, and such a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speache: for many times he would speake a whole day together, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his bodie with painfull exercises, as to abide heate, frost, and snow bare headed, and alwayes to goe a foote in the fildes, where his friends that did accompany him rode a horsebacke, and sometime he would come and talke with one, sometime with an other, as he went a foote by them. He had a wonderfull patience also in his sicknesses. For when he had any agew, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come and see him, vntill he perceiued his fit was of him, and that he founde he was better. When he supped with his friendes and familiars, they drew lottes who should choofe their partes. If he chanced not to choofe, his friendes notwithstanding gaue him the preferment to choofe: but he refused it, saying it was no reason, sith the goddesse Fama was E against him. At the first he did not vse to sitte long at the table, but after he had dronke one draught only, he would straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he sat long at the table, so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his friends, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, sayd, that his great busines and affaires in the common wealthe was the cause of it. For following that all the day long, hauing no leasure nor time to studie when night came, he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers, at the bord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, sayd, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night: Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, answered him, thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dyse: To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and facions of mens liues in his time were so corrupt, and required such great chaunge F and alteration: that to goe vprightly, he was to take a contrarie course in all things. For he saw that purple, red, & the lightest colours were best esteemed of: he in contrarie manner desired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner he would goe abroad bare footed without shoes, and without any gowne: not because he would be wondered at for any such a straungenes, but to acquaint him selfe to be ashamed only of shameles and dishonest things, and to despise those which were not reprobud, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talentes by the death of a cousin of his, that likewise was called Cato: he put it all into ready money, to lend to his frendes that lacked, and without vsury. And there were some of his frends also that would mortgage his land, or his slaues, to the chamber of the city, for their owne private busines: the which he him selfe would either giue the to mortgage, or else afterwards confirme the mortgage of them. Furthermore, when he was comen of age to marry, hauing neuer known woma before, he was made sure to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwarde the precontract being broken, he forooke her, so that she was free, when Cato was contracted to her. Notwithstanding, before Cato married her, Scipio repenting him that he had refused her, made all the meanes he could to haue her againe: & so he had. Cato tooke it so grievously, that he thought to goe to lawe for her: but his frendes dissuaded him from it. Then seeing no other remedie, to satisfie his angrie minde, he wrote verses against Scipio, in the which he reuiled him all he coule: vsing the bitter tauntes of Archilocus verses, but not such impudent, lewde, and childishe reproaches as be there. After that, he married Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the first woman he euer knewe: yet not the onely woman whom he did knowe, as is reported of Laelius, Scipios frende, who therein was counted the happier, because all that long time wherein he liued, he neuer knewe other woman but his first wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondemen (otherwise called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was chosen Prator of the armie vnder whom Cato serued of his owne good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Cappio, who in that armie had charge of a thousand footemen. Now Cato could not as he wished, shewe his valliantnesse and good seruice, because of the insufficiencie of the Prator that gaue ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the middelt of al the riot & insoleny of them in the campe, he shewing him selfe a stayed man in all his doings, valliant where neede was, and very wise also: all men esteemed him to be nothing inferior vnto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prator gaue him many honors in token of his valliantnes, which are giuen in reward of mens good seruice: howbeit Cato refused them, and sayd, that he was nothing wortie of those honors. These things made him to be thought a maruelous strange man. Furthermore, when there was a lawe made, forbidding all men that sued for any office in the common wealth, that they should haue no prompters in any of the assemblies, to blowe into their eares the names of private citizens: he alone making sute to be Colonell of a thousand footmen, was obedient to the law, & committed all the priuate citizens names to memory, to speake vnto euery one of them, and to call them by their names: so that he was enuid euen of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deedes praiseworthy, by so muche more were they grieved, for that they could not followe them. So Cato being chosen Colonell of a thousand footmen, he was sent into Macedon, vnto Rubrius, Prator there. Some say, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to see him go: one Munatius a frend of his sayd vnto her, take no thought Attilia, and leaue weeping, for I promise thee I will kepe thy husband for thee. It is well sayd, answered Cato. Then when they were a dayes iorney fro Rome, Cato after supper said vnto Munatius: thou must looke well to thy promise thou hast made Attilia, that thou wouldst keepe me for her, & therefore forsake me not night nor day. Thereupon he commaunded his men that from thence forth they should prepare two beds in his chamber, that Munatius also might lye there: who was rather pleasantly him selfe looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fiftene slaues with him, two free men, & foure of his frends, which rode, & he him selfe went a foote, sometime talking with one, otherwhile with an other as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the ROMANS, the Prator immediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who thinking it smal honor to him for him selfe only to be valliant, sith he was but one man, he praiged to make all his souldiers vnder him, like vnto him selfe. The which he did not by feare, & terror, but by lenitie & gentle perswasion, training & instructing the in euery point what they should doe: adding to his gentle instruction and perswasions, reward to those that did well, and

and punishment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to iudge, whether he had made them more quiet, then warlike: more valliant, then iust. So dreadfull they shewed them selves to their enemies, and courteous to their frendes: fearefull to doe euill, and readie to winne honor. Whereof followed that which Cato least accounted of, that is, he wanne fame, and good will: for his souldiers did greatly honor and loue him, because he him selfe would euer first set his hande to any thing he commaunded them, and because also both in his diet, in his apparrell, and in any iorney or paines, he was rather like vnto the meanest souldier, then any of the other Capitaines. In contrarie maner also, in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he farre exceeded all the other Colonells and Capitaines. For the true loue of vertue, (to wit, the desire to followe it) taketh no roote in mens mindes, onlesse they haue a singular loue and reuerence vnto the person, whome they desire to followe. When Cato vnderstoode that Athenodorus furnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philosopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the city of PERGAMVM, being a very old man, and one that stiffely refused the friendship of kings, Princes, and noble men, desirous to haue him about them: to write to him, he thought it was but lost labor. Wherefore hauing two moneths liberty by the lawes of the ROMANS, to followe his owne affaires: he tooke sea, and went into ASIA to him, hoping he should not lose his iorney, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of diuers matters together: at length he brought him from his first determination, and caried him to the campe with him, esteeming this victorie more, then all the conquestes of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most parte of all the prouinces and realmes of the East partes of the world. In the meane time, whilest he lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thousand footmen: his brother preparing to go into ASIA, fell sicke in the cite of ÆNVS, in the contrie of THRACIA. Cato hauing speedie intelligence thereof, tooke sea presently, when it was maruelous rough and boysterous, and imbarcked in a litle crayer of a marchaunts of THESSALIE, with two of his frends, and three bondmen onely, and did scape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arriued safely, a litle after his brother Cappios death. He tooke his death more forowfully, then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, imbracing the deade corse of his brother: but also for the exceeding charge and sumptuous funerals, which he bestowed vpon him, in perfumes, sweete saours, and sumptuous filkes that were burnt with his bodie: and furthermore, in the stately tombe of THRACIAN marble which he made for him, and set vp in the market place of the ÆNIANS, that cost eight talents. Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modestie and temperance he vfed in all things else, nor regarding with iudgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinsmen, which was mingled in him with his severity and hardnes, against all voluptuousnes, feare, and shamelesse requests. Diuers cities, Princes and noble men sent him many fundrie presents, to honor the funerals of his brother Cappio: howbeit he tooke no money of all them, sauing only spyes, and sweete saours, & such other ornamentes, as honored the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fell vnto him, and a litle daughter of his, by the death of his brother: notwithstanding the charge he had bene at, in his funerals, he did not reckon in the partition of the land, betwix him and his brother Cappios daughter. All the which things when they were solemnized, some write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the imbers where his brothers body had bene burnt, through a sieue or riddell, where through they cleanse corne, & all to get out the gold & siluer that was molten there. But suche thinke that their wraynges should be as farre from conrolement, as their doings. So when Cato's time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not only with ordinary praifes, vowes, and prayers to the goddesses for his health: but with imbracings, teares, and maruelous lamentations of the souldiers, which spread their garments on the ground as he went, and kissing of his hands, which honor the ROMANS did but to verie fewe of their Generalls. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to ROME to deale in the affaires there, to go and see ASIA, partly to be an eye wimes of the manners, customes, and power of euery prouince as he went: and partly also to satisfie king Deiotarus request, who hauing bene his fathers frend, had earnestly intreated him to come and see him: he went the iorney, and vied it in this sorte. First, by peepe of day, he sent his baker and a cooke before, where he ment to lye that night. They comming soberly into the city or village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friends and acquaintance there, and if they found none, then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the towne, and prayed them to helpe them to lodging, and did content them selues with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the townes men did not beleue they were Catoes men, and made no account of them: because they tooke all things so quietly, & made no a do with the officers. Inso much as Cato somtime came himselfe, & found nothing ready for him, & when he was come, they made as small account of him, seeing him set upon his cariages, and speake neuer a word: for they tooke him for some meane man, and a timorous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them vnto him, and tolde them. O poore men, learne to be more courteous to receiue traouelling ROMANES that passe by you, and looke not alwayes to haue Catoes to come vnto you: and therefore see that you vse them with such curtesie & entertainment, that they may bridle the authority they haue ouer you: for you shall finde many that will desire no better colour nor occasion, by force to take from you that they would haue: because you vnwillingly also do graunt them the things they would, & neede. There is a report of a pretie ieast happened him in SYRIA. When he came to ANTIOTCH, he found a great number of people deuided on either side of the streete, standing a row one by an other verie decently: the young men by them selues in fayer clothes, boyes by them selues in feemly aray, and priests & other officers of the city also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this solemne precession to honor him, and fell out with his men he had sent before, because they did suffer the to make such preparation for his comming. So he made his friends light from their horses, & go a foote to accompany him. But when they came neere to the gate of the city, the maiester of these ceremonies that had assembled all that company (an old man, hauing a rodde in his hand, and a crowne on his head) came to Cato without saluting of him, and asked him only, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeius flauies, & because Pompeius fame was great with all men, his seruant Demetrius also was much honored and made of aboute his deserte, for that he was in great credit with Pompey. Catoes frendes hearing what question the olde man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this precession. Cato being ashamed of it, sayd no more then: but, O vnfortunate citie. Afterwards notwithstanding, when D he told it to any body, he would laugh at it him selfe. So Pompey rebuked them, that through ignorance had failed to honor Cato. When Cato came to the citie of EPHESVS, and was comming towards Pompey to salute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignitie and estimation then he, who at that time also was Generall of a great and puissant armie: Pompey seeing him comming towards him a farre off, would not tary till he came to him, sitting in his chaire of estate, but rising vp went to meete him, as one of the greatest and noblest persons of ROME, and taking him by the hande, after he had imbraced and welcomed him, he presently fell in praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also commended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereuppon, euerie man after that had him in great veneration for those things, which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble & E courteous mind. For men that saw Pompeius entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced, & for a kinde of duty obserued, more then for any loue he bare him: & they noted further, that he honored him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he sought to kepe backe all the young gentlemen of ROME that went to see him, & desired them to remaine with him: but for Cato, he was nothing desirous of his company, for that in his presence he thought he could not commaund as he would, & therefore was willing to let him go, recommending his wife & his children to him, the which he neuer did before vnto any other ROMANE that returned to ROME: howbeit in dede Cato was partly allied vnto him. After that time, all the cities whereby he passed, deuided (in emulation one of the other) which of the should honor him most, & made him great feasts & bankets: in the which he prayd his frēds to haue an eye to him, least vnwares he shold proue Curios words true. A notwithstanding his seuerity asked Cato if he would go see Asia, when his charge were expired. Cato answered againe, that it was his full determination. Oh well sayd, Curio hope then thou wilt returne more pleasant and ciuill. And these were Curios words. But he more, Deiotarus king of GALATIA, being a very old man, sent for Cato to come into his countie to re- commend his sonnes & house vnto him: who, when he arrived there, had great his presents of all sortes offered him by the king, intreating him all he could to take them. This so much milked and angered Cato, that he comming thither in the euening (after he had taried there one whole day onely) the next morning he went his waye from thence at the thirde howe. Howbeit he had not gone one dayes iorney, but he found greater giftes that raised him, with Deiotarus letters, at the citie of PESSINVS: in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them him selfe, that then he would let them be deuied amongst his frendes, sith euery way they did deserue it, but specially for his sake; for that his goodes also were not so great, as could content all his frends. But Cato would not suffer them to take any iot of it more then before, although he saw well enough that there were some of them so tender harted, that they complained of him, for that he would not suffer them to take any of it. For he tolde them, that otherwise, corruption and briberie could haue had a honest colour to take: and for his frends, they should alwayes haue parte with him of that which was his owne iustly. So he returned king Deiotarus presentes backe againe. Nowe when he was readie to imbarke, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVDVSIVN: some of his frendes perswaded him, that it was better to put the ashes of his brother Capioes bones into another shippe. But he aunswered them, that he would rather lose his owne life, then to leaue his brothers reliques. Thereuppon he presently hoied sayle, and it is reported that he passed ouer in great danger, where other shippes arrived very safely. When he was returned vnto ROME, he was alwayes either talking Philosophie with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the market place to pleasure his frendes. When his turne came that he was to make sure to be Quæstor, he would neuer sue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the ordinance touching the office of Quæstor, and that he had particularly made enquerie of men of greatest experience to knowe what the authoritie of the office was. So, he no sooner came to his office, but he presently made great alteration amongst the clerkes and officers of the treasure: who hauing the lawes and records in their handes, and exercising the office commonly vnder young men which were chosen treasurers (who for their ignorance and lacke of experience, stood rather in neede of maiesters to teache them, then that they were able to correct others) they them selues were the officers, and controlled them. But Cato not contenting him selfe with the name and honor of the thing, did thoroughly vnderstand what the clerkes and registers shoulde be, and therefore would haue them to be as they ought to be, ministers vnder the Quæstors only, telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also, that fauted through ignorance. And when he sawe some insolent and impudent persons, that curried fauour with other treasurers to be against him: he caused the chieftest of them to be condemned for falsehood, in making diuision betwixt two coheires, and consequently turned him cleare out of his office, for euier doing any thing there any more. He accused an other also for forging of a will, whome Catulus Lucilius defending, being then Censor, and a man of great honor for the dignity of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the iustest man one of them in his time at ROME, and one of those also that highly commended Cato, & was conseruant with him for his honest life: when he perceived that he could not defend his man by no reason, he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wise graunt it. But Catulus earnestly intreating still for him: then Cato plainly sayd vnto him, It is a shame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Censor, and shouldest reforme all our liues, thus to forget the duetie of thine office, to please our ministers. Catulus looking at Cato when he had spoken, as though he would answer him: whether it were for shame, or anger, he went his way, & sayd neuer a word more. F Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voyce more that did condemne then cleere him, because of the absence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quæstorship, being sicke at that time, and absent, Catulus sent vnto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man: Thereupon Lellius being brought thither in a litter after iudgement given, gaue his last voyce, which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithstanding, would neuer vse him as a cleake, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lellius voyce among others. Thus hauing pulled downe the pride and baggage of these cleakes, and brought them vnto reason: in short time he had all the tables and records at his commaundement, and made the treasure chamber as honorable as the Senate it selfe: that euery man thought, and sayd, that Cato had added vnto the Quaestorship the dignity of the Consulship. For finding diuers men indebted before vnto the common wealth, and the common wealth also vnto diuers men: he sette downe such an order, that neither the common wealth should be deceived by any man, nor that any man also should haue wrong of it. For being rough with the that were indebted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their dett, and willingly & quickly also payed them to whom the chamber ought any thing: so that the people were ashamed to see some pay which neuer thought to haue payed any thing, and on the contrary side also others payed, which neuer looked to haue had any parte of their dettes payed them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make false billes of their detts, and brought them so to be put into the cofer of the Quaestors: and many times also his predecessors were wont of fauor and frendship to receiue false messages. For whilest he was Quaestor, he neuer did passe away matters so lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a message that was sent vnto him, to knowe whether it was true or no: albeit diuers men did witness it was true, yet would he not beleue it, vntill such time as the Consulles them selues came in their owne persons to iustifie it was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla being Dictator, had appointed in his second proscription twelue thousand silver Drachmas for euery citizen and outlaw which they had slaine with their owne handes. These men, though euery man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people & cruel murderers: yet no man durst offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called these men in suite, as those that did wrongfully detain the money of the common treasure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: (sharply reproofing (and iustly) the wicked deuilish fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were straight accused by others for murder: & as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one iudgement, they were brought into an other, to the great ioy of all the ROMANS, who then thought they saw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla him selfe punished. Besides all this, Catoes continuall paines and care of the treasure, was so well thought of, and liked of the people, as could be. For he was alwayes the first that came to the cofer of the treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was neuer wearie of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer missed to be at any assembly of the people or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, least lightly by fauor, any money due to the common wealth should be forgiven: or else that they should abate the rent of the farmers, or that they should geue no money but to the that had iustly deserved it. Thus hauing ridde all accusers, and also filled the coffers with treasure: he made men see, that the common wealth might be riche, without oppressing of any man. In deede at his first coming in to the office, his colleagues and companions founde him marvellous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and seuer: howbeit they all loued him in the end, because he only withstoode the complaints and cries of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or fauor let go the money of the common treasure) & was contented his companions should excuse them selues vnto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault upon him, saying, that it was vnpossible for them to bring Cato vnto it. The last day that he went out of his office, being very honorably brought home to his house by the people: it was told him that Marcellus, being in the treasure chamber, was attempted & enuironned with many of his friends, and men of great authoritie, that were earnestly in hande with him to record a certaine gift of money, as a thing that had bene due by the common wealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes frend euen from their childhood, & whilest Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him: but when he was left alone, he was of so gentle a nature, that he would easily be intreated, and was as much ashamed to deny any man, as he was also ouerreadie to graunt euery man that he required. Cato straight

A straight returned backe vpon it, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacye, and recorded the gift: he caused the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did raise it out before his face: Marcellus speaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repayed against that he had done, neither then nor at any time after, but continued still frendshippe with him, as he had done before. But now, though Cato was out of his office of Quaestor, he was not without spialls of his men in the treasure chamber: who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and passed in the treasure. And Cato him selfe hauing bought the bookes of accompt for the summe of fife talents conteyning the reueneue of the whole state of the common wealth, from Syllas time vntill the very year of his Quaestorshippe: he euer had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate and the last that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarying long before they came, he went and sate downe in a corner by him selfe, and red closely the booke he had vnder his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would neuer bee out of the cite on that day when he knew the Senate should assemble. After that, Pompey and his consorts perceiving that it was vnpossible to compell Cato, and much lesse to winne or corrupt him, to fauor their vnjust doings: they fought what means they could to keepe him from coming to the Senate, and defending certeine of his friends causes, & to occupy him some other wayes about matters of arbitrement. But Cato finding their wiles and craft, to encounter them; he tolde his frendes once for all, whom he would pleasure: that when the Senate did sit, no mans cause could make him be absent from thence. For he came not to serue the common wealth to enrich him selfe as many did; neither for any glorye or reparation, nor yet at all aduenture: but that he had aduisedly chosen to serue the common wealth, like a iust and honest man, & therefore thought him selfe bound to be as careful of his dutie, as the bee working her waxe in the honnycombe. For this respect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of his frendes which he had in euery prouince belonging to the Empire of ROMA: he gotte into his handes the copies of all the chiefest actes, edicts, decrees, sentences, & the notablest iudgements of the gouernors that remayned in recorde. Once Cato perceiving that Publius Clodius a seditious Orator amongst the people, did make great furre, and accused diuers vnto the assembly, as the Priestes and Vestall Nunnes: (amonge the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wiues sister was accused) he taking their cause in hand, did so disgrace Clodius their accuser, that he was driuen to flee the cite. Cicero therefore giuing Cato thanks, Cato tolde him, that he must thanke the common wealth, not him, for whose sake onely he both sayd and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certein Orator or common counsellor preferred one wimes vnto the Iudges, the counsellor on thother side tolde them, that one wimes was not to be credited, though it were Cato him selfe. Inasmuch as the people tooke it vp for a prouerbe among them, that when any man spake any straunge and vnlikely matter, they would say: Nay, though Cato him selfe said it, yet were it not to be beleued. When on a time a certaine prodigall man had made a long oration in the Senate, in praise and commendation of sobriety, temperance, & thriftines: one Ammaus a Senator rising vp, said vnto him, alas, frend, what thinkest thou? who can abide to heare thee any longer with patience: that fareit at thy table like Craffus, buildest like Lucullus, & speakest to vs like Cato? So men commonly (in sport) called them Catoes, which were graue and seuer in their wordes, and dissolute in their deedes. When diuers of his friends were in hand with him to sue to be Tribune of the people, he told them he thought it not meete at that time for such an office (ye) of great authoritie as that, is not to be employed, but like a stronge medicine in time of neede. So, the teame and matters of lawe ceassing for that tyme, Cato went into the contry of LYXIA to take his pleasure there; where he had pleasant houses: and tooke with him both his bookes & Philosophers to keepe him company. Because, meeting as he went, with diuers sumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men besides, he asked them whose cariage it was: they told him it was Metellus Nepos that returned to ROMA, to make sute to be Tribune. Thereupon Cato stayed sodainly, and bethinking him selfe, commaunded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruailling at it, he answered them: Doe not you know that Metellus is to be feared of him selfe, for his rashnes and folly? & now that he commeth instructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would

for all the common wealth a fire? for this cause therefore, we must not now goe take out plea. A fire in the contry, but overcome his folly, or otherwise dye honorably in defence of our libertie. Yet at his friends persuasions, he went first vnto his house in the contry, but tarried not long there, and returned straight againe to Rome. When he came thither ouernight, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, & sued to be Tribune of the people, purpose-ly to crosse Metellus enterprise, because the power & authoritie of the Tribune consisteth more in hindring, then doing any thing: for if all men els were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were against it, the Tribune would carry it from them all. Cato at the first had not many of his friends about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made sure for the Tribune ship, all his friends and noble men straight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and incouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to serue the common wealth, then his owne turne, considering, that where many times before he might (without resistance or deni- all) haue obtained the same, the state being toward no trouble, he then would neuer sue for it, but now that he saw it in danger, where he was to fight for the common wealth, and the pro- tection of her libertie. It is reported that there was such a number of people about him to fa- uor his sute, that he was like to haue ben stifled among them, & thought he should neuer haue comen to the market place, for the preasle of people that swarmed about him. Thus when he was chosen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceived how they bought & sold the voy- ces of the people when the Consuls were chosen: whereupon he made an oration, & sharply tooke them vp for this detestable marchandise, and after his oration ended, solemnly protested by othe, that he would accuse him, & bewray his name, which had giuen money to be chosen Consul. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllanus, whose sister, Seruilis, he had married: but he flatly accused Lucius Murena, that had obtained to be Consul with Syllanus, by means of his money. Now a law being provided, that the party accused might haue a keeper or spiall to follow the accuser, to see what he would accuse the party with, that he might the better be able to defend him selfe, knowing what should be objected against him: Murena hauing one for him to waite vpon Cato, to consider thoroughly what course he tooke, when he saw that he went not malici- ously to worke, but tooke a plaine common way of a iust accuser: he had fo great confidence in Cato's vpright mind and integritie, that not regarding the narrow sitting of him otherwise, he did one day aske him him selfe in the market place, (or at home in his owne house) if that day he were determined to prosecute any matter against him touching his accusation. If Cato answered him that he did not: then he went his way and simply beleued him. When the day came in deed that his cause was to be heard, and pleaded vnto: Cicero being Consul that yere, defending Murena, played so pleasantly with the Stoicks Philosophers, and their strange o- pinions, that he made all the Iudges laughe: in so much as Cato him selfe smiling at him, tolde them that were by him: see, we haue a pleasant Consul that makes men laugh thus. So Murena being discharged by this iudgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Consul, he was alwaies ruled by his counsell in all his affaires, and continued cuer to honor him, following his counsell in all things touching his office. Hereof Cato him selfe was cause, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counsell, and in his orations before the people, for the maintenance onely of equitie and iustice: for otherwise, he was very ciuill & courteous to al men. But before he entred into his Tribuneship, Cicero being yet Consul, he did helpe him in many things touching his office, but specially, in bringing Catilins conspiracie to good ende, which was a noble act done of him. For Catilin did practise a generall commoti- on and suture in the common wealth, to ouerthrowe the whole state of Rome, by ciuill di- corde within Rome, and open warres abroad: who being discouered and overcome by Ci- cero, he was driuen in the ende to flie Rome. But Lentulus, Cethegus, and many other of the ac- complices of this conspiracie, blamed Catiline for his faynt and cowardly proceeding in it. For their partes, they had determined to burne the whole cite of Rome, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by strange warres, and rebellions of foreine nations and prouin- ces. Howbeit this treason being discouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred vnto the iudgement of the Senate, to determine what was to bee done therein. Syllanus being the first who was asked his opinion therein, sayde, that he thought it good

A good they should suffer cruell paines: and after him also, all the rest said the like, vntill it came to Cesar. Cesar being an excellent spoken man, & that rather desired to nourish then to quench any such furies or editions in the common wealth, being fit for his purpose long determined off: made an oration full of sweete pleasant wordes, declaring vnto them, that to put such men as them to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether vnreasonable, and rather that they should doe better to keepe them in prison. This oration of Cesar fo altered all the rest of the Senators minds, for that they were afraid of the people: that Syllanus selfe mended his opinion againe, and said, that he ment not they should put them to death, but keepe the fast in prison, because that to be a prisoner, was the greatest paine a Roman Citizen could abide. Thus, the Senators minds being fo sodainly chaunged, & bent to a more fauorable sen- tence: Cato rising vp to say his opinion, beganne very angrily with maruelous eloquence, grie- uously to reprove Syllanus for chaunging his mind, & sharply to take vp Cesar, that vnder a po- pular semblance, & maske of sweete sugred wordes, he sought vnder hand to destroy the com- mon wealth, and also to terrifie and make the Senate afraid: where he him selfe should haue bene afraid, and thinke him selfe happy, if he could scape from being suspected, giuing such apparant cause of suspicion as he did, going about so openly to take the enemies and traytors of the common wealth out of the hands of iustice, seming to haue no pitie nor compassion of his naturall cite, of such nobilitie and fame, being euen brought in maner to vtter destruction, but rather to lament the fortune of these wicked men, that it was pity they were euer borne, & whose death preferred Rome from a thousand murders & mischiefs. Of all the orations that Cicero made, that only was kept: for Cicero the Consul, that day had dispersed diners penne men in sundry places of the Senate house, which had maruelous swift hands, and had further taught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements, which in fewe lines shewed many words. For vntill that time, writers were not known that could by figures & ciphers expresse a whole sentence and word, as afterwards they could: being then the first time that euer they were found out. So Cato at that time preuailed against Cesar, and made them all chaunge their mindes againe, that these men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a ior of his maners, as the very pattern and impression of his mind: It is reported, that when Cato that day was so whot, and vehement against Cesar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both a letter: was deliuered Cesar, sent him into the house. Cato began presently to suspect it, and so earnestly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commaunded his letter should be seene & red openly. Cesar thereupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that fate not farre from him. When Cato had red it, and found that it was a loue letter which his sister Seruilis had written vnto Cesar, whom she loued, and had known: he cast it againe to Cesar, & said, there, dronkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begon before. In fine, it seemeth that Cato was very vnfortunate in his wiues: for this Seruilis, as we haue sayd, had an ill name by Cesar. And the other Seruilis also, which was his sister, was worse defamed. For he being married vnto Lucullus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by who he had a sonne, was in the ende put away from him, for her naughty life. But worst of all, his owne wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspicion: For though he had two sonnes by her, yet he was driuen to be divorced from her, she was so naughty and common. After that, he married Maria, the Daughter of Philip, which by report seemed to be a very honest gentlewoman. It is she that is so famous amonge the Romans. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or comedy) is disputable, and hard to be iudged. For thus it was, as Thraseas writteth: who refer- reth all to the report and credit of one Mummius, Cato's very familiar friend. Amonge many that loued Cato's vertues, and had them in admiration, some of them did shew him more what he was, then other some did: amongest the which, was Q. Hortensius, a man of great honestie and authoritie. He, desiring not onely to be Cato's friend and familiar, but also to ioyne with him in alliance, and by affinitie to make both their houses one: was not abashed to moue him, to let him haue his Daughter Porcia in marriage, (which was Bibulus wife, & had brought him two children) that he might also cast abroad the feede of goodly children, in that pleasant fer- tile ground. And though to men this might seeme a strange mind and desire, yet that in re- spect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the common wealth, not to suffer a young woman in the prime of her youth, to lose the frute of her wombe, being apt to beare children. A nor also that he should impoverish his sonne in lawe with moe children, then one house needed. And further, that communicating women in this sort from one to another, specially being bestowed upon worthy and vertuous men: that vertue should thereby bee increased the more, being so dispersed in diuers families, & the citie likewise should be the stronger, by making alliances in this sort together. And if it be so, he, that Bibulus doe loue his wife so dearly, that he wil not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him again, when he had a child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by means of this communication of children with Bibulus selfe, and with him. Cato answered him, that he loued Hortensius well, and liked of his alliance: howbeit that he marvelled he would speake to him to let him haue his Daughter to get children of, sith he knew that she was married to another. Then Hortensius altering his tale, stucke not to tell him his mind plainly, and to desire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children enough. But a man can not tell whether Hortensius made this sute, because he saw Cato make no reckoning of Maria, for that she was then with child by him. In fine, Cato seeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not deby him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips good wil, the father of Maria. He knowing that Cato had graunted his good wil, would not therefore let him haue his daughter, before that Cato him selfe by his presence did confirme the contract & marriage with him. Though these things were done longe after, yet hauing occasion to talke of Cato's wiues, I thought it not amisse to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus, and his consorts of Catiline's conspiracie being put to death: Cesar, to cloke the accusations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate, did put him selfe into the peoples hands, and gathering the rakehells and seditious persons together, which fought to set al at six and seven, he did further encourage them in their mischieuous intent & practises. Whereuppon, Cato fearing least such rabble of people should put all the common wealth in vpror & danger: he perswaded the Senat to winne the poore needy people that had nothing, by distributing of come amongst them, the which was done. For the charge thereof amownted yearly vnto twelue hundred and fifty talents. This liberalitye did manifestly drinke vp and quench all those troubles which they stood in feare of. But on thother side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certen seditious orations and assemblies, & preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great should presently be called into ITALY with his armie, that he should keepe the citie by his comming, from the present danger of Catiline's conspiracie. These were but words spoken for facions sake, but in deede the law had a secret meaning, to put the whole common wealth and Empire of ROME into Pompey's hands. Hereuppon the Senate assembled, wherein Cato at his first comming, spake somewhat gently, and not to vehemently against Metellus, as his manner was to be sharpe vnto them that were against him: but modestly perswaded him, and fell to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwaies taken part with the Senate and nobilitie. But Metellus therewith tooke such pride & conceit of him selfe, that he began to despise Cato, thinking he had vied that mildnes, as though he had bene affraide of him: insumch as he gaue out proud speeches against him, and cruell threats, that in despite of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato chaunging his countenance, his voice and speech, after he had spoken very sharply against him in the ende he roughly protested, that while he liued, he would neuer suffer Pompey to come into ROME with his armie. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their witts, but that Metellus doings was a furie, which proceeding of a cancred stomake and extreame malice, would put all in hazard: & that which Cato did, was a rauishment and extacy of his vertue, that made him beside him selfe, contending for iustice and equitie. When the day came that this law should passe by voyces of the people, Metellus sayled not to be in the market place with a worlde of straungers, slaues, and sencers, armed, and set in battell raye, besides a number of the common people that were desirous to see Pompey's returne, hoping after chaunge. Besides all those, Cesar then being Prætor, gaue ayde likewise with his men, in the behalf of Metellus. On the contrary part also, the noble men and Senators of the citie were as angry as Cato, and said it was a horrible shame: howbeit they were his friends, rather in misliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth.

Julius Cesar Prætor.

A Whereuppon, all his friends at home, and his whole family, were maruailously perplexed & sorrowfull, that they both refused their meate, and also could take no rest in the night for feare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, hauing a good hart with him, did comfort his people, and had them not sorrow for him: and after he had supped, as he commonly vied to doe, he went to bed, and slept soundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague, & fellow Tribune, came & called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them: Whereuppon diuers of their friends came and met them by the way, & bad them take heede vnto them selues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato saw the temple of Castor and Pollux: full of armed men, and the degrees or steps kept by sword players and sencers, and Metellus on the top of them set by Cesar turning to his friends he sayd, see I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, against one man naked, and vnarmed. Therewithall he straight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of them selues to let him passe, but they would let no other goe vp but him selfe: But Cato with much a doe, taking Minutius by the hand, got him vp with him, and when he was come vp, he late him downe betwixt Metellus and Cesar, to keepe them a sponder, that they should not whisper one in anothers eare. Neither of them both could tell what to say to him. Whereuppon the noble men that considered Cato's countenance and boldnes, wondring to see it, drew neare, and by their cries willed him not to be affrayd, but encouraged one another to sticke by him, that stood for defence of their libertie. So, there was a seruauant that tooke the written law in his hand, and would haue red it to the people: but Cato would not let him. Then Metellus tooke it him selfe in his hands to reade it: but Cato also snatched it out of his hands. Metellus notwithstanding, hauing it perfect without booke, would needes declare the effect of it by harte. But Thermus clapped his hande before his mouthe to keepe him that he should not speake. Metellus seeing these two men bent by all means to keepe this law from passing, and that the people did leane on their side: he beckned to his men to goe for the armed men which were at home in his house, that they should come with terror and cries to make them affrayd, and so they did. The people thereuppon were disperfed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threw stones at him from beneath. But then Muranus, who had before accused Cato for buying of the Consulshippe, forsooke him not in that danger, but holding his longe gowne before him, cryed out vnto them beneath, that they threw at Cato, to leaue. So shewing him the danger he had brought him selfe vnto, holding him still by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Castor and Pollux. Then Metellus seeing the pulpit for orations voyded, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the gole: VVhereuppon commaunding his souldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to passe his lawe. But his enemies that fled for feare, being gathered againe together in the market place, beganne a freshe to cry out against Metellus, with greater boldnes and corage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being affrayd and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were provided, and therefore were the bolder: they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for orations. So, when Metellus and his company were gonne, Cato came agayne to the pulpit for orations, and greatly commended the people for the good will they had shewed, and perswaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereuppon the common people were then against Metellus, and the Senate also being assembled gaue order, that Cato should haue better ayde then he had before, and that by all meanes possible they should resist Metellus lawe, which onely tended to moue sedition & ciuill warre in ROME. For Metellus selfe, he was yet vehemently bent to followe his attempt and enterprise: but perceiving that his friends were maruailously affraide of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he sodainly came into the market place, and assembling the people, told them many reasons in his oration, supposing to bringe Cato in disgrace with the people, and amongst other things he sayd, that he would withdraw him selfe out of this tyrannical power of Cato's, and his conspiracie against Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long, should repent, for that they had shamed and defaced so noble a man. After that, he presently departed ROME, and went into ASIA to informe Pompey of all this matier. Cato on thother side was greatly esteemed for his doings, for that he had freed the common wealth from the great trouble of such a foolish Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had also suppressed the power of Pompey. But he was yet much more commended, when he was against the Senate, who would haue noted Metellus of infamie, and deprived him of his office, the which he would not suffer them to doe. The common people thought him of a courteous and gentle nature, because he would not treade his enemy vnder his foote, when he had the vpper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wise men iudged it otherwise, that it was wisely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warre, of the which it seemed that Pompey had taken the honor & glory from him for the ending of it, & was likely also to haue bene put from his honor of triumph, for that Caius Memmius was his aduersary, who layed many accusations against him before the people, rather to please Pompey, then for any malice els he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had married his owne sister Sernilia, as also for that he saw they did him wrong: resisted this Memmius, & defended many accusations against him. So that in the end, though Memmius had labored that Cato should be deprived of his office, as from a tyrannicall power: yet Cato compelled Memmius at the last to leaue of his accusations, and to prosecute law no more against him. Thus Lucullus hauing obtained honor of triumph, did embrace Cato's friendship more then before, taking him for a sure bulwarcke & defense against the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey shortly after returning home againe, with great honor from his conquests, trusting that for respect of his welcome he should be denyed nothing at the peoples hands when he came home: sent before vnto the Senate, to pray them for his sake to deferre the election of the Consuls, vntill he came to Rome, that being present he might fauor Piso's sute, suing to be Consul. Thereunto the most part of the Senate gaue their consent, but Cato on thother side was against it, not that the deferring of the time was a matter of such importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to goe about to attempt any newe deuises, in so much that he made the Senate chaunge opinion againe, and Pompey's request was denied. Pompey being maruelously troubled withall, and perceiving that Cato would be against him in all things if he found not some deuise to winne him: he sent for his friend Annatius, by his meanes to demand Cato's two Neces of him which were mariable: the eldest for him self, & the youngest for his sonne. Others say also, that they were not his Neces, but his own daughters. Annatius did Pompey's message, & brake the matter vnto him, his wife, & to his sisters, who maruelously desired Pompey's alliance, for the greatnes and dignitie of his person. But Cato making no farther delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleased with the motion, answered him presently. Annatius goe thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be wonne by women, though otherwise I mislike not of his friendship: and withall, that so long as he shall deale vprightly in all causes, & none otherwise, that he shall find him more assuredly his friend, then by any alliance of marriage: & yet, that to satisfie Pompey's pleasure and will against his contry, he wil neuer giue him such pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his answer & refusal, saying it was too stately and vn courteous. But afterwards it chaunced, that Pompey suing to haue one of his friendes made Consul, he sent a great summe of money to brybe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, & spoken of, because the money was told in Pompey's owne garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his house, that if he had now bene bound by alliance of marriage vnto Pompey, he should then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompey's shamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confessed then that he was wiser to refuse such alliance, then they were that wished and desired it. And yet, if men should iudge of wisdom, by the successe and event of things: I must needs say, that Cato was in great fault for refusing of this alliance. For thereby he was the cause of Pompey's marching with Cesar, who ioyning both their powers together, was the whole destruction of the Empire of Rome: Whereas peradventure it had not fallen out so, if Cato fearing Pompey's light fautes, had not caused him by increasing his power with another, to commit farre greater fautes. Howbeit those things were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at iare with Lucullus, touching certain ordinances which he had made in the Realme of Pontus, because both the one and the other would haue their ordinances to take

A take place: Cato fauoured Lucullus, who had open wronge. Pompey therefore seeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, tooke parte with the people, and purforth the lawe for diuiding of the landes amongst the souldiers. But Cato slowly resisting that lawe againe, he put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquainte him selfe with Publius Clodius, the moste seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes, and besides that, made alliance euen at that tyme with Cesar, whereof Cato him selfe was the only Author. Cesar returning out of SPAIN from his Pratorshippe, requyred the honour of tryumphe, and withall made sute to bee Consul. But being a lawe to the contrary, that they that sued to bee Consuls should bee present them selues in the cite, and suche also as desired honour of tryumphe, should bee without the cite: he earnestly required the Senate, that he myght sue for the Consulshippe by his friendes. The moste parte of the Senate were willing vnto it, but Cato was stally agaynst it. He perceiving that the other Senatours were willing to gratifie Cesar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole daye in his oration, and by this pollicie preuented the Senate, that they could not conclude any thinge. Then Cesar letting fall his tryumphe, made sute to be Consul, and entring the cite, ioyned friendship with Pompey. Hereuppon he was chosen Consul, and immediately after married his Daughter Iulia vnto Pompey: and so hauing made in manner a conspiracye agaynst the common wealth betweene them selues, Cesar preferred the lawe Agraria, for distributing the landes vnto the Citizens, and Pompey was present to mainteyne the publication thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on thother side taking parte with Bibulus the other Consul, did what they could agaynst it, but specially Cato: who fearing muche this alliance of Cesar and Pompey, that it was a pacte and conspiracie to ouerthrowe the common wealth, sayde, that he cared not so muche for this lawe Agraria, as he feared the rewarde they looked for, who by suche meanes dyd intile and pleale the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people besides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his parte: maruailing muche, and also being offended with Cesar's greates vnreasonablenes and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Consulshippe did preferre suche thinges, as the moste seditious Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to doe, to currye fauour with the people, and by suche vile meanes sought to make them at his commaundement. Wherefore, Cesar and his friends D fearing to fight enemies, fell to open force. For to beginne withall, as the Consul Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of donge powred vpon his heade: and furthermore, the Officers rodde were broken in their hands, which they caryed before him. In fine, dartes were throwen at them out of euery corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driuen to flye, and leaue the market place. But Cato, he came laste of all, keeping his wonted pace, and often cast backe his heade, and cursed such Citizens. So, they did not onely passe this lawe Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that all the Senate should bee sworn to stablish that lawe, and bee bounde to defende the same, (if any attempted the alteration thereof) vpon greates penalties and fines to bee sette on his heade, that should refuse the other. All the other Senators sware agaynst their wills, remembering the example of the mischiefe that chaunced vnto the olde Metellus, who was banished out of ITALY, because he would not sweare to suche a like lawe. Whereuppon, the women that were in Cato's house, besought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeelde and take the other: and so did also diuers of his friendes besides. Howbeit, he that moste enforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswaded him, that peradventure he would bee thought vnreasonable, that being but one man, he should seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and that it were a sonde parte of him wilfully to put him selfe in so greates daunger, thinking to hynder a matter already past remedie. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconuenience would happen, if he forooke his contry (for whose sake he did all these thinges) and left it a praye vnto them, which sought the vter subuersion of the same, as if he were glad to bee ridde from the trouble of defending the common wealth. For, sayde he, though Cato haue no neede of Rome, yet Rome hath neede of Cato, and so haue all his friendes: of the A which, Cicero sayde he was the chiefe, and was moste maliced of P. Clodius the Tribune, who sought to driue him out of the contrye. It is sayde that Cato beeing wonne by these like wordes and perswasions at home, and openly in the market place, they so fofemed him, that he came to take his othe laste of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friende of his. Casars hatte beeing then list vpper, for that he had brought his first purpose to passe: beganne nowe to preferre an other lawe, to diuide all CAMPANIA, and the contrye called TERRA DI LAVORO, (the lande of labour) vnto the poore needy people of Rome, and no man stode against him but Cato. Whereuppon Casars made his officers to take him from the pulpit for orations, to cary him to prison. All this made not Cato slowpe, nor leaue his franke speeche, but as he went he still spake against this edicte, and perswaded the people to beware of them that preferred suche lawes. All the Senate, and the beste sorte of Citizens followed Cato with heauy hartes, shewing by their silence, that they were offended and angrye for the iniurye they did vnto him, beeing so worthy a man. Inasmuch as Casars selfe perceived that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition & stomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would haue appealed vnto the people. So when he saw that Cato ment not such matter, at length ouercomen with shame and dishonor, he him selfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Casars practise tended to this ende, that when he had wonne the peoples fauor by such lawes: they should then graunt him the government of all the GAULES (aswell on this side, as beyond the mountaines) and all ILLYRIA, with an armie of foure legions, for the space of five yeares, notwithstanding that Cato told the people before, that they them selues with their own voyces did set vpper a tyrant, that one day would cut their throats. They did also chuse Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble house: a thing directly contrary to the law. But this Clodius had promised them, so that they would helpe him to banish Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calpurnius Piso (Casars wifes father) and Gabinus Paulus, (a man wholly at Pompeys commaundement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Consuls the next yeare following. Now, notwithstanding they had the rule of the common wealth in their owne handes, and that they had wonne parte of the citie with brybes, and the other parte also with feare: yet they were both affraid of Cato, when they considered what trouble they had to ouercome him, which they did very hardly notwithstanding, and to their great shame, beeing driuen to vse force, and yet thought they should neuer haue done it. Furthermore, Clodius vterly dispaired that he could possibly banish Cicero, so longe as Cato was there. So deuising wayes howeto doe it, when he had taken possession of his office, he sent for Cato, and beganne to tell him, that he thought him the honestest and iustest man of Rome, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deede. For, where many made sute vnto him to be sent into CYPRVS, to make warre with king Ptolemy: he thought none so worthy as him selfe, and therefore for the goodwill he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleasure. Cato straight cryed out with open mouth, that this was a deule to intrappe him, not to pleasure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely answered him, well, seeing thou wilt not goe with goodwill, thou shalt goe then against thy will: and so he did. For at the first assemblye of the citie, he caused the people to graunt his commission for his iorney thither: but they neyther appoynted him shippes, nor fouldiers, nor any other Ministers to goe with him, sauing two Secretaries onely, of the which, the one of them was a very villayne and arrant theefe, and the other, one of Clodius followers. Besides all this, as if they had appoynted him but lide to doe in CYPRVS agaynst Ptolemy, he made them commaunde him after that, to goe and restore the outlawes and banished men of the citie of EYZANTIVM, vnto their contrye and goodes agayne, of purpose onely to keepe Cato farre enoughe from Rome, whylest he continued Tribune. Cato beeing driuen by necessitie to obeye, he counselled Cicero (whome Clodius pursued) to beware that he made no stirre agaynst him, for feare of bringing Rome into ciuill warre and murder for his sake: but rather, to absent him selfe, that he might an other tyme preferre his contrye. After that, he sent his friende Canidius before into CYPRVS, vnto Ptolemy, to perswade

Cato committed to prison by Casar.

P. Clodius, Tribune of the people. The crafty ingling betwixt Casar and Pompey with P. Clodius.

Cato sent Ambassador into Cyprus.

A perswade him to bee quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he should neether lacke honour nor riches, for the Romanes would graunt him the priesthoode of Venus in the citie of PAPHOS. Cato in the meane tyme remainyng in the Ile of RHODES, preparing him selfe there, and abiding his answer. In the tyme of these sturres, Ptolemy king of EGYPT, for a certain offence and discorde with his subiectes, departing out of ALEXANDRIA, sayled towards Rome, hoping that Casars and Pompey with a great armie would restore him to his crowne and kingdome agayne. He beeing desirous to see Cato, sent vnto him, supposing he would come at his sending for. Cato by chance was occupied at that tyme about some busines, and badde the Messenger will Ptolemy to come to him, if he would see him. So when Ptolemy came, he nether went to meete him, nor rose vpper vnto him, but onely welcomed him, and badde him sitte downe. It amazed the king at the first to see vnder so simple and meane a trayne, suche a statelines and maiestie in Catoes behavior. But when he hearde him boldly talke with him of his sayres, and suche graue talke come from him, reprouing his follye he had committed, to forsake suche princely pleasure and wealth, to goe and subiect him selfe vnto suche dishonour, suche extreame paynes, and suche passing great giftes and presents, as he should throwe awaye, to satisfie the couetoulines of the rulers at Rome, the which was so vnstable, that if all the Realme of EGYPT were converted into siluer to giue amonge them, it would scarce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to returne backe with his nauye, and to reconcile him selfe agayne with his subiectes, offering him selfe also to goe with him, to helpe to make his peace. Then Ptolemy comming to him selfe, and repenting him of his follye, knowing that Cato tolde him truly, and wisely: he determined to followe his counsell, had not his friendes turned his mynde to the contrarye. So when Ptolemy came to Rome, and was driuen to wayte at the gates of the Magistrates that were in authoritie: he sighed then, and repented his follye, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wife man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolemy that was in CYPRVS (a happye turne for Cato) paysoned him selfe. Cato beeing also informed that he leste a wonderful summe of money behynde him, he determined to goe him selfe vnto EYZANTIVM, and sent his Nephewe Brutus into CYPRVS, because he durst not truste Canidius so farre. Then hauing restored the banished men vnto the peoples sauiour agayne, settinge agreement betwixt them, he returned into CYPRVS. There he founde a maruailous greate treasure, and plate bothe of golde and siluer, tables, precious stones, hanginges, and purple silkes, all the which he was to make readye money of. There he tooke greate care and paynes to rayse all thinges to the vrmoste and dearest pryses that coule bee, and he him selfe was present at all, to keepe reckoning of the laste penney. Wherefore, to bringe this to passe, he would not stande to the common vse of the sale of the cryer, but suspected them all, bothe cryers, praylers, and his owne friendes, and therefore talked him selfe with the praylers, and made them sette high pryses vpon euery thinge that was to bee sold. And thus were the moste parte of the goodes sold and caryed awaye, at the dearest pryses. This did maruelously offende the moste of his friendes, E when they sawe that he did mistruste them: but Munatius specially, his dearest friende, tooke it so inwardly, that he thought neuer to bee friendes with him agayne. Inasmuch as in the booke Casars wrote agaynst Cato, in this place he forceth moste the accusation agaynst him. Munatius notwithstanding wryteth, that he was not angrye so muche with Cato for that he mistrusted him, but for a certayne disdayne he had him selfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deedes and sayings, whome Thraseas in his historye chiefly followed. In this booke he sheweth that he came late into CYPRVS, and was very illlodged. And furthermore also, that when he would haue come into Catoes house, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was busie, doinge some thinge with Canidius. He modestly complaining of it vnto Cato, had this churlish answer: ouermuch loue, sayth Theophrastus, oftentimes causeth hate. So fareth it with thee, who ouerlouing me, doest thinke that I esteeme thee not as thou deseruest, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I must tell thee truly,

I doe rather employe him for his skill and faithfulness in things, then any man els: for that he hath beene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was neuer bryb'd, but cleane handed still. These wordes Cato tolde Munatius secretly betweene them two: but afterwards he knewe that he had also reported them vnto Canidius. When he sawe that, he would no more go and suppe with Cato as he was wont, and when he was also called to counsell, he would not come there nether. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would seale vpon all his goods and cariage, as they vse to handle them that are disobedient vnto iustice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke sea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to supper together, vnto a friend of theirs, called Barca. Thereupon Cato also arriued, and came thither, when they were all sette at supper, and asked where he should sit. Barca tolde him agayne, where it pleased him. Then casting his eyes about, he sayd he would sitte by Munatius: and so fetching a compassse about the borde, he went and sate by him, but offered him no friendshippe and familiaritie all supper tyme. Afterwards notwithstanding, at the request of Martia, that was earnestly in hande with Cato for him: he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and speake with him. Munatius went to Catoes house in the morning, where Martia layed him, and kept him companie, vntill all the rest that came to salute Cato, were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made verry muche of him. We haue the willinglier dilated this matter at length, because mens natures and manners might be discerned euen in these small matters of friendshippe priuately, as otherwise in the greatest publicke causes. Now touching Catoes commission, he gotte together litle lesse then seuen thousand silver talents. Furthermore, fearing the farenesse of the iorney he had to goe by sea, he made diuers litle cofers, and put into euery one of them two talents, and five hundred Drachmas, and tyed vnto each of them a longe rope, and a greates pece of corke: because that if the shippe should fortune to miscarye, those cofers might shewe where the chestes with money laye in the bottome of the sea. Thus was all the money faued, sauing a litle, and brought safely to Rome. Cato hauing made two bookes wherein he had noted all things done in his iorney, he could neither saue thone nor thother of them. For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away: who taking shippe at the hauen of Cenchrees, was him selfe drowned, and the booke he had also, lost with him. The other booke which he him selfe had kept, vntill he came vnto Corfov: he lying in the market place of the cite in his tents, which he caused to be set vpp: the Mariners being very cold in the night, made so great a fire, that it burnt the tents, stuffe, booke and all. Notwithstanding, he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomyes slaues with him, who while he liued, had the charge and custodie of all his treasure and riches, the which he brought as witnesses, to stoppe the mouthes of his malicious enemies, that would haue accused him in any thing. But yet the losse of them did grieue him, not so much for the greates care and paynes he had taken in setting downe the account of his charge, for the iustificacion and prooffe of his fidelitie and good seruice: but also, for that they might haue serued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to haue bene a like carefull in their charge, as him selfe. But the goddes denied him this good happe. Newes being brought that he was come to Rome by water, when they vnderstood that he was at hand, by and by all the Magistrats, the Priestes, the Senate, & the most part of the people also went out to meete him by the riuers side: so that both sides of the riuer of Tyber were full of people, and the receiuing of him in, seemed not inferior to the entry of a triumphe. Notwithstanding, some thought him very presumptuous, that the Consuls and Prætors comming out to meete him, he did not stay his gally, but rowed full vpp the streame (being in a kingly galley of six owers to euery bancke) and neuer stayed, vntill all his fleet arriued in the hauen. This notwithstanding, when the cofers with money were caried thorough the market place into the treasure chamber, the people wondred to see so great a quantitie of it. And thereupon the Senate being assembled, with great and honorable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorship, and priuiledge also, at any common sports to weare a purple gowne. Cato refused all these honours, and onely besought the Senate to make Nicias a free man, Steward of the late diseased king Ptolomy, being a witness of his faith

A and great paynes he had taken in this seruice. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Consul, so that after a sorte, the authoritie of the Consul was in Cato: because Lentulus, colleague and fellowe Consul with Philip, did no lesse reuerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his allyance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was restored agayne from his banishment, the which Publius Clodius (being then Tribune of the people) had put upon him, and being agayne growen to great credit: he went one day into the Capitoll, in the absence of Clodius, by force to take awaye the tables which Clodius had consecrated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the tyme he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being assembled, Clodius did accuse Cicero of this violent facte. Cicero answered him agayne: that because Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the lawe, therefore all his doings were voyde, and of no validitie. Then stood vpp Cato, and sayde: he knewe that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was scanty good and allowable, but yet if generally any man shoulde vndoe all that he had passed by that authoritie: then all that he him selfe had done likewise in CYPRVS, must of necessitie bee reuoked. For the commission that was graunted vnto him (by vertue whereof he had done many thinges) shoulde be vnlawfull: because the Tribune also that did graunt it him, was not lawfully chosen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune against the lawe, who by consent of the lawe was taken out from a noble house, and made a populer person: howbeit, if he had behaued him selfe vnductfully in his office, as other men that happily had offended: then he was to be accused to make him mend his faulte, and not to destroye the authoritie of the officer, which in C it selfe was lawfull. After that, there fell misliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counter buffe he had giuen him: and Cicero continued a long tyme after, before he did shewe him any countenance of friendshippe as he had at other tymes done. But afterwards they were reconciled together agayne, by this occasion. Pompey and Craffus hauing bene with Cæsar to talke with him (who for that purpose came out of GAULE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demaund the second Consulship together, and when they had it, then to proroge *Cæsar*s government for five yeares more, and also they would haue the best prouinces and greatest, for them selues, with great armies, and money enough to paye them with. This was in deede a playne conspiracie to denide the Empire of Rome betweene them, and vterly to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. At that time there were many noble men, which came to make sute for the Consulship. But when they sawe Pompey and Craffus offer to make sute for it, all the reste gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had married Porcia, Catoes sister: through whose perswasion he would not relinquish his sute, considering that it was not the office onely of the Consulship that was the chiefest matter of importance, but the libertie of the Senate and people. Straight there ranne a rumor through the most parte of the people, that they were not to suffer Pompeys power to be ioyned with Craffus, by meanes of this office: for then his authoritie would bee too great and stronge, and therefore, that of necessitie one of these two were to bee denied. For this cause therefore, the good men tooke Domitius parte, and did encourage him to goe on with his sute, assuring him of ayde vnder hande of diuers, which durst not bee seene openly for feare of those two great men, who at the daye of the election would procure him voyces in his fauour. Pompey and Craffus mistrusting this, made Domitius bee sette vppon, going with torche light before daye into the field of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and first striking the torche bearer that went before him, they hurt him sore, that he fell downe deade at his feete. Then they layed at the rest in like case, who finding them selues cruelly hurt, ranne awaye euery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato post alone. But Cato, notwithstanding he was hurt in one of his armes, still helde Domitius fast, and prayed him to tary, and not to leaue to defende the libertie of their contrie, against tyrants, which playnly shewed after what manner they would gouerne, sith by suche wicked meanes they aspyred to tyrannicall government. All this notwithstanding, Domitius would tarye no longer, but betooke F him to his legges, and ranne home. Thus were Craffus and Pompey without denyall proclaimed Consuls. Cato neuer yeelded therefore, but came and sued to bee Prætor, because that thereby he might yet make it some strength and countenance to him against their Consul-shippe, that beeing no priuate person, he shoulde haue some better authoritie to resist them. A that were the chiefe persons. But they fearing, that the Prætorshippe by the estimation of Cato, woulde come to equal their authoritie of the Consulshippe: first assembled the Senate (the most parte of the Senators not hearing of it) and in that assemblye caused the Senate to decree: that all suche as were chosen Prætors, shoulde presently goe to their charge, not attending the tyme and libertie appoynted by the lawe, during which tyme men might accuse those which had bought the voyces of the people with money. Then hauing by this culler and decree sette yll doers at libertie, without feare of punishment, they pretending to vie corruption, did preferre some of their owne Ministers to make sute for the Prætorshippe, them selues giuing money to corrupt the people, and being present also at the election. But notwithstanding all these practises, the vertue and reputation of Cato ouercame them. For the people had him in so great reuerence, that they thought it too shamefull a parte to sell Cato by voyces, who deserved rather to bee hyered to take the Prætorshippe upon him. Then the first Tribe being called to giue their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey seeing that, straight brake of the assemblye, making a shamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the ROMANES doe maruelously detest, and will conclude nothing when it thundereth. Howebeit afterwards they gaue more money, then they had done before, and thereby draue away the chiefe men out of the felde of Mars, and by practise obtained, that Vatinius was chosen Prætor for Cato. And therepore went, that they that had so wickedly giuen their voyces, feeling them selues pricked in conscience, fledde immediately out of the felde: and the honest men that remained, were both very sory and angrie, for the iniurie they had offered Cato. At that tyme one of the Tribunes keeping an assemblye of the citie, Cato stoodde vpp, and tolde (as if he had prophesied) before them all, what woulde happen to the common wealth by these practises, and stirred vpp the people agaynst Pompey, and Cæsar, saying: that they were gilty of those things, and therefore procured them to bee done, because they were affrayde that if Cato had bene Prætor, he would too narrowly haue sifted out their deuises. In fine, Cato going home to his house, had more company to wayte vpon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had bene chosen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a lawe for the deuiding of the prouinces vnto the newe Consuls, SPAYNE and AFRICKA vnto the one, and ÆGYPT and SYRIA vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good bothe by sea and lande: all other men hauing no hope to keepe it backe, did let it alone, and spake nothing to contrarye it.

 Then Cato getting vpp into the pulpit for orations, before the people beganne to giue their voyces, coulde hardly haue two howers space to speake: but at length, they perceyuing that he delayed tyme by foretelling things to come, woulde suffer him to speake no longer, but sent a Sergeant vnto him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cryed out notwithstanding, and diuers gaue good eare vnto him: the Sergeant went to him agayne, and tooke him, and caryed him out of the market place. Howebeit the Officer had no sooner left him, but he went strayght towards the pulpit for orations, and there cryed out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to haue an eye to ayde the libertie of their common wealth, which went to ruine. VVhen he oftentimes together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being made withal, commaunded his Sergeant to cary him to prison. The people followed him hard notwithstanding, to heare what he sayd vnto them. VVhereuppon Trebonius fearing some sturre, was forced to commaund his Sergeant to let Cato goe. So Cato draue of all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithstanding, the contrary faction hauing partly put the ROMANES in feare, and wonne the other parte also by fayre wordes and money, and by force of armes likewise kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from coming out of the Senate: and after they had also violently driuen Cato out of the market place, for saying that it thundred, and hauing hurt many men, and also slayne some out of hande in the market place: in the ende they forcibly passed the decree by voyces of the people. Many being offended therewith, went a company of them together to plucke downe Pompeys images: but Cato would not suffer them. And afterwards also, when they preferred an other law for the prorogation of the prouinces & armies which

A Cæsar demanded: Cato would speake no more to the people to hinder it, but protested vnto Pompey him selfe, that he saw not how he plucked Cæsar upon him, and that he should feele the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither suffer nor remedy it, he would euen cast his burden and him selfe upon the common wealth, and too late would remember Catos warnings, which were priuately as profitable for Pompey, as openly iust and reasonable for the cõmon wealth. Cato vied many of these perswasions sundry times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made accompt of them: for he woulde not be perswaded that Cæsar would euer change in that sorte, and besides he trusted too much to his owne power and prosperitie. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prætor for the next year following, in the which it appeared (though he ministred iustice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maiestie and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foote barelegged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there geue sentence of life and death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And some report, that he would geue audience when he had dynd, and dronke wine: but that is vntrue. Now Cato perceyuing that the citizens of ROMER were marred by bribes and gifts of those, which a-spiried vnto offices, and that the people made it an arte and facultie to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common wealth, he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that such as hereafter should be chosen Consuls or Prætors, shoulde (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer them selues before the iudges, and taking their othe, should truly declare what meanes they had vsed to attaine to their office. This offended the futers for the C offices, but muche more the mercenarie multitude. Whereuppon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, and all cried out vpon him, reuiled him, and threw stones at him: inso much as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and him selfe also was driuen out of the place by the preefe of people, and had much a doe to get to the pulpit for orations, where standing on his feete, he presently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldnes and constancie of his countenance only. Then when all was pacified by the present perswasions he vsed, aply spoken to purpose for the instant, they ge-uing attentive eare, without sturre or vprore. The Senate geuing him great commendation therefore, he told them roundly and plainly: but I haue no cause to praise you, to leaue a Præ-tor in such daunger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the futers for the offices, they D were in a maruelous case: for one way, they were affrayed to geue money to buy the peoples voyces, and on thother side, they were affrayed also if any other did it, that they shoulde goe without their sute. So they were all agreed together, euery man to put downe twelue Myriades & a halfe a peece, and then they shoulde make their sute iustly & vprightly: and whosoever were taken faury, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should lose the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded betweene them, they chose Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the same money. This match was made in Catos house, where they all did put in caution or sureties to answer the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato assitting the Tribune that gouerned the election, and carefully marking howe they did geue their voyces: he E spied one of the futers for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the rest. But they greatly commending his iustice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it punishment enough vnto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured him selfe the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he seemed therein to take upon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court, and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honor and credit doth procure more enuy, then iustice doth: because the people doe commonly respect and reuerence that, more then any other. For they doe not honor them as they doe valliant men, nor haue them in admiration, as they do wise men: but they loue and trust them better. As for the two first, the one they are affrayed of, and the other they distrust: beside, they suppose that valliancy and wisdom com-F meth rather by the benefite of nature, then of our intent and choyce, esteeming wisdome, as a readines of conceit, and fortitude, a presence and courage of the minde. For euery man may be iust that will, and therefore iniustice is of all other vices most shamefull: for it is a wil-full and malicious default, and therefore can not be excused. Loc this was the cause why all the noble men in manner were against Cato, as though he only had overcome them. Pompey, he thought that the estimation of Cato was altogether the discountenance of his power and greatness, and therefore did daily raise vp many railers against him. Of them Fabius Clodius that seditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in friendship with Pompey: he accused Cato, and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common wealth of a wonderfull treasure, by his commission in CYPRVS: and that he was enemy vnto Pompey, because he did refuse to marry his daughter. Cato thereto made aunswere, that he had brought more golde and siluer out of CYPRVS, into the treasure of ROME, without the allowance of either horse or souldier: then Pompey had done with all his triumphes and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreover, that he did neuer seeke alliance with Pompey, nor that he thought him vnworthie of it, but because he saw he delt not as vprightly in the common wealth as he him selfe did. I, sayd he, haue refused a prouince offered me when I came out of my Prætorshippe but Pompey hath taken some by force, and geuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæsar not long since, an armie of six thousand men to serue him in the warres in GAULE: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey graunted them him by our consent. But we see, that so many armies, armors and weapon, so many men and horses, by common pleasures of our priuate citizens, geuen and lent at our charge. And Pompey him selfe reseruing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenant generall, assigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernment of others, whilest he him selfe besiegeth here the walls of the citie, with seditious & tumultuous election of officers, craftily vnderminde thereby the state of the common wealth, to bring all to confusion, that he him selfe might be absolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, such a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN was sayd to be in old time, vnto Socrates, who did counterfeite to be an other him selfe, in doing all things as he did. This man would be farr out of reason, and passionate in his talke, storming like a dronkard. He one yere made sute to be Ædilis, but he was reiecte. Howbeit Cato that furthered his sute, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were wrytten, were all one hande. So, he finding out the falschoode, appealed thereupon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voyde for that time. After that Faonius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, and specially in setting forth plays in the Theatre, which are customably done at the comming in of euery such new officer, to geue the people pastime: and gaue vnto the common players and dauncers in those plays, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde oliue twigges, as they commonly vse in GREECE at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GREEKES leekes, lettises, radishes, and peares: and vnto the ROMANES, they had earthen pottes full of wine, porke, figges, cowcombes, and fagots of wodde of small value. In so much as some thought some of the they were so meane, others were verie glad of them, seeing that Cato which was seuer and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by litle and litle they turned this austeritie of his into pleasure. In fine, Faonius him selfe sitting downe amongst the people, which looked apon the players, clapped his hands for ioy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he should geue them good rewardes that E played well, alluring them also about him to doe the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of those sports. At the selfe same time, Curio, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewise goodly plays in an other Theatre: but all the people forsooke his, and went to see Faonius plays, who sate among them like a priuate man, and Cato as the maister of the plays. Cato did this in scorn and mockerie, of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to bestow in such trifles, shewing thereby, that whosoever will make any plays, he should make the charge but a sport also, furnishing it only with a convenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about such a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hippens and Milo, sued all three together to be Consuls, not only by bribery of money (a common fault then in suing for any of the offices in the common wealth) but by plaine force F of armes, slaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were so desperat and insolent: some preferred a lawe, that they should make Pompey President in these elections, because him should

A moue their sute after a lawfull sorte. But Cato straight was against it, saying, that the law could haue no safety by Pompey, but Pompey might haue safety by the lawe. Notwithstanding, when he sawe this trouble continue of a long time, without any Consuls in ROME, and that daily there were three campees in the market place, that it was almost impossible to preuent the mischief at hand, and to stay that it should goe no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne good willes, rather then by compulsion, should put the gouernment of the state into Pompeys hands alone, choosing the lesse euill, to withstand the greater, and so to yeld to the absolute gouernment, without constraint, which the sedition would bring it vnto. Therefore Bibulus Catoes friend & kinsman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would choose Pompey sole Consul. For, sayd he, either the common wealth shall be well gouerned by B him, or else ROME shall serue an ill Lord. Cato then rising vp, beyonde all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and sayd: that the citie were better to haue one soueraine Magistrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could geue present order for the pacifying of this confusion, and that he would be careful to preferre the citie, when he sawe that they trusted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes chosen sole Consul. Then he sent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the suburbs of the citie. Cato went thither, and was receiued with as great honor & curtesie of Pompey, as could be deuised: and in the end, after he had geuen him great thanks for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to afford him his aduise and counsell in his gouernment. Cato answered him thus, that he had not spoken any thing before that time in respect of any ill will he bare him: neither that he deliuered this last opinion of his in respect of his friendship, but wholly for the common wealths sake: howbeit otherwile, that for his owne priuate affaires, if he thought good to vse his aduise, whensoever it pleased him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the best he could. But for common causes, that he would alwayes tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him: and in fine, he performed all he sayd. For first of all, when Pompey did set grieuous penalties & new fines apon their heades, which had bought the peoples voyces for money: Cato counseled him to prouide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already past. For sayd he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man should seeke to reforme the faults that are past: and furthermore, if the punishments appointed were newer then the offences committed, then they should doe wrong vnto them that D were already accused, to punish them by a new law which they had not offended. Afterwards also, certaine men of good calling (Pompeys friends) being accused, Cato perceiving that Pompey grew remisse, and yielded in many things: he sharply reprimed, and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praifes which were wont to be spoken of the offenders that were accused: he him selfe notwithstanding hauing wrytten an oration in the praise of Munatius Plancus, sent it vnto the Iudges, whilest his cause was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, stopped his eares with both his hands, and would not haue it red. Wherefore Plancus refused him for one of his Iudges, after his cause was pleaded vnto: howbeit he was condemned notwithstanding. To conclude, Cato was such a grieue and trouble vnto them that were accused, that they could not tell well howe to deal with him. E For, once they durst not lette him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well abide to stufe him. For there were many that were condemned, which refusing Cato, seemed vnwisshers that they were guiltie: & many also were shamefully reprimed, because they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this sort for a while, Cæsar remained in GAULE with his armie, where he made warres: nevertheless he wanted him friends till in ROME, by gifts and money, and made him selfe very strong. Now appeared Catoes predictions and forewatnings true vnto Pompey, and began to quicken his spirits which had slept so long, and made him then to consider of the daunger, the which before he could not be perwaded to beleue. But perceiving his slackenes and feare withall, doubting howe to proceede: to preuent *Cæsar*s practises, Cato determined to sue to be Consul, with intent either F to make him leaue his armie, or else to finde out the practise he intended. Catoes competitors, they were both of the very honest men also, of the which, Sulpitius had receiued great honor & preferment by Catoes credit and authoritie in respect whereof, many thought that it was scant honestly done of Substitutum, to shew himselfe fo vnthankfull, as to stand against Cato in this A fute. Howbeit Cato neuer complained of the matter, but sayd, that it was no maruell he would geue place to no man in that, sith it was the greatest good hadde that euer came vnto him.

 This notwithstanding he perswaded the Senate to make a law, that from thence forth, such as sued for any office, they should them selues be suters to the people, and not preferre their sute by others. This caused the people to be more offended with him, then before, bicause thereby he did not only take away their fingering of money, which they got by their voyces in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had alio to pleasure many, bringing them now into pouterie and contempt. He therefore hauing no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather sticking to his graue maner and modest life, then to seeke the dignitie of a Consul by such meanes: made sure him selfe in person, and would not suffer his B frends to take the ordinary course which might win the peoples harts, whereupon he was put from his Consulshippe. This denyall was wont not only to haue made the parties refused, very forowfull, but their frendes and kinsemen alio greatly aghamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his frends in the field of Mars, and after he had dyed, walked againe in the market place, as his maner was, without shooes on his feete, and coate. But Cicero blamed him much for that, bi-cause the common wealth requiring then such a Consul as he, he had not carefully endeuored him selfe by curtesie and gentle meanes to winne the fauor of the people, neither would euer after make sure for it, although at an other time he sued to be Prator. Thereunto Cato answered, that for the Pratorship, he was not denyed it by the good will of the people, but C rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Consuls, where there was no deceiufed, he knew plainly he went without it, for his maners which the people misliked: the which he thought were no wise mans parte to change for any mans pleasure, nor yet by making the like sure againe, to hazard the refusal. Furthermore, Cato making warre with very stowt nations, & hauing with no small daunger & trauell subdued them: and hauing also let vpon the GERMANES, with whom the ROMANES were at peace, and also slaine three hundred thousand persons: his frends made sure that the people should do solemne sacrifice to geue thanks vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they should deliuer Cato into their hands, whome he had iniured, to receiue such punishment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be cast vpon him, that the D citie might be no partaker of it, sith they could not do withall. Neuertheless, sayd he, we are to doe sacrifices vnto the goddes, to geue them thanks, for that they turned not the reuenge of the fury and rashnes of the Capitaine, apon our poore souldiers which were in no fault, but haue pardoned the common wealth. Cato being aduertised thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senate, contayning many accusations against Cato. The letter being red, Cato rose, not as a man put in a chafe with choller, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would say) declared that the accusations which Cato heaped against him in his letters, were but pretie mockes and sleights which he had gathered together to make the people merry withall. But on thother side, when he beganne to vnrippe his whole intents and practises from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemy, but rather a E confederate with him in his conspiracie, declaring that they were not the GERMANES, nor the GAULES, which they were to be affrayed of, but of him selfe, if they were wise: he thereupon so offended the Senate, and made such furre among them, that Cato's frends repented then they had caused his letters to be red in the Senate, giuing Cato thereby occasion iustly to complaine of Cato, & to alleage much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Cato, but this was sayed onely, that it were good reason to let him haue a successor. Then Cato's frendes made sure that Pompey should put away his army, and resigne vp the prouinces he kept, or else that they should compell Cato no more then him to doe it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and sayd, the thing was now come to passe, which he had euer told them of, and that Cato came to oppresse the common wealth, F openly turning the armie against it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the same. All this preuailed not, neither could he thereby winne any thing of the Senate, bicause the people fauored

A noyed Cato, and would alwayes haue him great: for the Senate did beleue all that he sayd, but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cato had wonne the citie of ARIMINUM, and was coming on with his armie towards ROME: then euery man looked apon Cato, and the people and Pompey confessed, that he only from the beginning had found out the marke Cato shot at, and had hit the white of his lie deuiſe. Then sayd Cato vnto them, if you would haue beleued me, my Lordes, and followed my counsell: you should not now haue bene affrayd of one man alone, neither should you also haue put your only hope in one man. Pompey answered thereunto, that Cato in deede had gesſed more truly, howbeit that he also had delt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counsell, that the Senate should reſerre all vnto Pompey's order: for, sayd he, they that can doe great mischief, knowe also howe to helpe it. Pompey perceiuing that he had no army conuenient about him to tary Cato's com-ming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint harted: he forsooke the citie. Cato being determined to goe with him, sent his younger sonne before vnto Munatius, which laye in the contrie of the BRYTANS, and tooke his eldest sonne with him. Now, bicause he was to prouide a stay and gouernor of his houle and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widowe and verie riche, for that Hortensius dying, made her his heire of all that he had.
 Therein Cato vpbraideth Cato much, reprouing his couetousnes to marry for goodes. For, sayd he, if he had neede of a wife, why then did he before graunt her vnto another? If he had no neede of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnlesse she were before a bayte vnto Hortensius, to keepe her whilest she was young, that he might haue her againe C when she was riche. But against that, me thinkes it is sufficient to recite theſe verses of Enripides:

Vnlikelihoodes first I will diſproue. For wch? what man can say, That euer feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reprove Hercules cowardlines, and Cato's couetousnes. But if his marriage be to be reprobued, peraduenture it is in an other sorte. For so soone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his houle and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey.
 But after that time, men reporte that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented, and bewailed in his hart, the miserie and calamie of his contrie, whether they had victorie, or were ouercome. So hauing the prouince of D SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto SYRACUSA. There vnderſtanding that Asinius Pollio was arriued at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies: Cato sent vnto him, to knowe wherefore he came thither. Pollio againe asked of him, who was the cauſer of all this warre.
 Again, when Cato was aduertised that Pompey had forsaken ITALIE, & that he lay in campe beyond the ſea, by the citie of DYRRACHIVM, then he sayd, he ſaw a maruelous great chaunge and incerteintie in the prouidence of the goddes: that when Pompey did all things beyond reaſon, and out of course, he was inuincible: and now that he sought to preferre his contrie, he ſaw he lacked his former good happe. Nowe he knewe he was strong enough at that time, to driue Asinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would: but bicause there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that land, with the miserie of warre. Then after he had aduised the SY-E RACUSANS to take the stronger parte, and to looke to their safety: he tooke the ſea and went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did alwaies couſel him to prolong the warre, hoping ſtill off ſome treaty of peace: & would in no caſe they ſhould come to fight any battell, where the weaker parte ſhould of neceſſity be put to the ſword, by the ſtronger. Therefore he perswaded Pompey and the counſellers about him, to eſtabliſhe certaine lawes to this effect.
 That they ſhould ſacke no citie in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of ROME: and alſo, that they ſhould kill no citizen of ROME, but in ſurie of battell, when their ſwordes were in their hands. Therby he wanne him ſelfe great honor, and brought many men to take Pompey's parte, by the lenity and clemency he vſed vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being ſent into ASIA, to aide them that had commiſſion to preſſe ſhippes & men of warre, F he tooke his ſiſter Servilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widowhoode, ſhe had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name: ſhe had tented her selfe with his straight manner of life. This notwithstanding Cæsar did not let to shame her to Cato. Pompey Captaines had no neede of Cato any where, but at the Rhodes. For he wanne the people there with his curteous visage & perswasion, leauing with them Servilia and her little sonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had leauied a great armie both by sea and land. There did Pompey most of all discouer his minde and intent. For first he ment to haue geuen Cato the charge of the armie by sea, which were aboute fise hundred shippes of warre, besides an infinite number of foystes & pinafes, & such small bottomes vnconquered: but sodainly considering better of it (or possibly being informed by some of his friends, that al Catoes regard & counsell in matters of gouernment was, to deliuer Rome from tyranny, & that if he had to great a charge vnder him, Cæsar being once ouercome, he would also force Pompey to leaue his army, & so make him subiect to the law) he chaunged his minde, notwithstanding he had already moued it to Cato, & leauing him, gaue Bibulus the charge of all his army by sea. But Cato therefore shewed no lesse good will vnto Pompey, then before. For it is reported, that in a certaine skirmish & cōflict before the city of Dyrachium, Pompey encouraging his souldiers, & commaunding euery Capitaine also to do the like in his quarter the souldiers gaue but faint care vnto them, & made no manner of show of men whose harts had bene any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time serued) the reason of Philosophie, and the effect of libertie, manhoode, death, and honor, and that with a great vehemēt affection: and last of all ending his oration, calling upon the gods, turning his speache vnto them, as if they had bene present to haue seene how valiantly the souldiers fought for the libertie of their contry: they gaue such a lustie crye, and had such a braue conceite & vehement desire to fight like men, that all the Capitaines were filled with good hope, and so led them to battell, where they gaue such a cruell charge and fierce onser upon their enemies, that they ouerthrowe them, and put them that day to flight. Howbeit Cæsar's good fortune tooke the final end of this victorie from Pompey, by his ouergreat feare and mistrust who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we haue wrytten more amply in his life. But when all the rest reioyced that they had done so noble an exploit, & made their vawnts of the great advantage they had of their enemies: Cato to the contrarie bewailed the calamitie of his contrie, and lamented that cursed ambition which caused so many good and valliant citizens of one selfe citie, so to kill and murder one another. After this ouerthrowe, Cæsar taking his way into Thessalie, Pompey raised his campe to followe him, and leauing a great power at Dyrachium, of men, armor, munition and frends: he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fiftene ensignes of footemen besides. The which he did for the feare and mistrust he had of him, being assured, that if by ill fortune he should lose the battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a trustier man then he: but on thother side if he wanne the victorie, he doubted fore that he could not commaund as he would, where Cato was. There were also many other noble men, as a man would say, cast away, and left at Dyrachium, with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battell at Pharfalia being blown abroad, Cato resoluēd with himselfe if Pompey were dead, that he would passe ouer all his men into Italy, and then like a banished man would him selfe alone wander as farre as he coulde from the tyrannie: and contrarily, if he were alieue, that then he would keepe his army together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he passed ouer the sea into the Ile of Corfu, where Pompeys armie by sea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would haue surrendered vp his charge vnto him, as to a man of greater dignitie, for that he had bene Consul, and Cato only but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wise receiue it, but returned immediately into Italy. Cato then perceiving that Pompey the younger (sonne vnto Pompey the great) of a rash & hawry minde, would haue punished all them that went into Italy, and left the armie by sea, and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproued him priuately for it, so that he certainly sauēd Ciceros life, and many other moe besides. Now Cato supposing that Pompey the great had sauēd him selfe in Egypt, or in Africke, he determined to take the seas, to meete him with all his men: but before he tooke shippe, he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arriued in Africke, sayling vp & downe the coast there, he met with Sextus, the youngest sonne of Pompey, who first told him, that his father

Cato went in to Africke.

A father was slaine in Egypt: when the souldiers heard it, they tooke it very heauely, and not one of them after the death of Pompey the great, would serue vnder any other Capitaine then Cato. He therupon being ashamed, & thinking it pity also to leaue so many noble & good men that had serued so faithfully vnder him, without a Capitaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whether to goe: at their request he was contented to take charge of them, and went first vnto the citie of Cyrene, where not many dayes before, the citizens had shut the gates against Labiennus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had receiued him: and that Mitru Varus, vnto whom Pompey had geuen the charge of the prouince of Africke, was in their company with an army, and determined to goe ioyne with them. So he went by lande in the winter time, and had gotten a maruelous number of asses together, to cary water and vittels, which followed him with a great number of carts besides, and of those men, which the Africans call Pillies, to wit, they that doe heale the stinging of serpents, and doe sucke out the poyson with their mouthes, and doe furthermore charme and enchaunt the snakes, that they haue no power to doe any hurt. He was seuen dayes together marching continually, and went a foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horse or beast. From that day forth, on the which he vnderstoode of the battell lost at Pharfalia, he neuer supped, but sitting, and added that vnto the rest of his sorrow, that he neuer layed him downe, but when he went to bedde for all night. Cato hauing passed the winter in Lybia, he brought his souldiers into the felds, which were aboute tenne thousand persons. The affaires on their side had but hard successe, for the contention and variance betwext Scipio, and Varus, for the which, they both flattered king Iuba to winne his fauor: being a maruelous prowde man for his greatnes and riches: as he heued the first time he spake with Cato. For when Cato came, he caused his owne chayre to be set betwext Scipio and Cato, to haue the honor to be in the midst. But Cato perceiving it, tooke vp his owne chayre, and set on thother side by Scipio to put him in the midst, notwithstanding that he was his enemy, and had wrytten a shamefull booke against him. Many make no account of this facte of Cato, but reprove him, because that walking one day with Philostatus in Sicily, he gaue him the vpper hand, honoring him for his Philosophie. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vsed Scipio, and Varus, as his noble men and subiects: howbeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the companie prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio him selfe, and Varus both, did first geue him place, and willingly resigned vnto him the honor to commaunde the whole campe: he answered them, he would not offende the lawe, fith he made warre onely to preferue the authoritie and priuiledge thereof, neither would take vpon him to commaunde all, him selfe being but Viceprætor, where there was a Viceconsull present. For Scipio was created Proconsull, and furthermore, the people had a certayne confidence that their affaires would prosper the better, if they had but the name of a Scipio to leade them in Africke. Nowe when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he would straight, for Iubas sake, haue put all the inhabitants of the citie of Vtica (without respect of age) vnto the swordes, and haue rased the houles to the grounde as thole that had taken Cæsar's parte. Howbeit Cato would neither suffer him, but protesting vnto them that were present, and calling the gods to witness in open counsell, with great difficulty he sauēd the poore people of Vtica from that cruell tragedy and slaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipios instance, Cato tooke upon him to keepe the city, fearing least by treason, or against their wills, it should come into Cæsar's hands: because it was a strong place of situation, and well replenished with all things necessary for him that should keepe it. Cato did both furnish it, & also fortifie it. For he brought in great store of corne, he repaired the rampers of the walls, made great high towers, & cast depe trenches round about the city, paling the in: & betwext the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of Vtica, & compelled them to deliuer vp their armor & weapon and kept all the rest within the city it selfe, carefully providing, that neuer a man of the should be hurt by the Romanes, & besides, did also send corne, armor, munition & money vnto the campe: so that the city of Vtica was the staple & storehouse of the warres. Moreouer, as he had before counseled Pompey not to come to battell, the like counsell he now gaue also vnto Scipio not to hazard battell against a man of great skill & experience in warres, & but to take time, whereby, by litle and litle, he should consume the power & strength of Catoes tyranny. But Scipio was so stowt, that he regarded not Catoes counsell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlines in this manner: that it was enough for him to be safe in a good city compassed about with walls, though otherwise he fought not to hinder men to be valliant, to execute any enterprise as occasion was offered. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to goe into ITALIE with his footemen and horsemen which he had brought in to AFRICKE to draw Caesar from them, and to turne him against him. Scipio made but a sport at it. Then Cato shewed plainly, that he did repent him he had geuen him the preferment to be general of the army, because he saw he would but fondly prosecute this warre: & also, that if he chanced to ouercome, he could not moderately vfe the victory against his contry men. Then he beganne to mistrust the good successe of this warre (and so he told his frendes) for the Generalls hastines and vnskillfulnesse: and yet if beyonde expectation it fell out well, and that Caesar were ouerthrowen, he would neuer dwell at ROME any more, but would flye the crueltie and biternes of Scipio, who euen at that present time did proudly threaten many. But in the ende, that fell out sooner then looked for. For a poste came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was lost, in a great battell, by the citie of THAPSUS, which Caesar had wonne: that he had taken both campes, that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a fewe men, and that all the rest of their armie was slaine. These newes did put the citizens in such a feare and maze, (and specially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could scant keepe them selues within the walles of their citie. But Cato meeting with them, stayed them that ranne vp and downe crying in the streetes, and did comfort them the best he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare from them, though he brought them againe vnto them selues from the extasie they were in, declaring vnto them, that the losse was nothing so great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge suche newes with wordes enow. By these perswasions, he somewhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day, he made proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had chosen for his counsellers, should come and assemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of ROME, which for trafficke of marchaundise lay in AFRICKE, and all the ROMANE Senators and their children also. Nowe whilst they gathered them selues together, Cato him selfe went verie grauely with a set most countenance, as if no suche matter had happened, hauing a litle booke in his hande, which he read as he went. This booke conteyned the store and preparation of munition he had made for this warre, as corne, armor, weapons, bowes, slings and footemen. When they were all assembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulness of these three hundred ROMANES, which had profitably serued their contry with their persons, money, and counsell, and did counsell them not to depart one from another, as men hauing no hope, or otherwise seeking to saue them selues scatteringly. For remaining together, Caesar would lesse despise them, if they would make warre against him: and would also sooner pardon them, if they craued mercie of him. Therefore he counsellled them to determine what they would do, and for his owne parte, he sayed he would not mislike whatsoeuer they determined of: for if their mindes followed their fortune, he would thinke this change to proceede of the necessity of time. But if they were resolute to withstande their misfortune, and to hazard them selues to defend their libertie: he then would not only commend them, but hauing their noble courage in admiration, would him selfe be their chieftaine and companion, euen to proue the fortune of their contrie to the vttermost. The which was not VTICA, nor ADRYMETVM, but the citie selfe of ROME: the which oftentimes through her greames, had raised her selfe from greater daungers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many waies to saue them selues, & the greatest meane of all was this: that they should make warre with a man, who by reason of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAYNE of the one side was vp against him, and tooke parte with the younger Pompey: and the citie of ROME also not being vied to be bridled with the fraile of such insolencie, could not abide it, but would rather rise with any other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuse any daunger, but to take example

A of their enemy: who, to worke his mischieuous intent, spareth not his person in any daunger. And contrarily also, that vnto them, the incertaintie of the warre, if victorie followed, would make them happy: as also in being ouerthrowen, their death would turne to immortal glory. Notwithstanding, they were to thinke of the matter among the selues, & to make their prayers to the gods, that in recopence of their vertue & good seruice which they had shewed thitherunto, they would graunt the grace to determine for the best. After Cato had ended his oration, there were diuers of the that were stirred vp by his liuely perswasions, but the most part of the were incoraged by his constancy & noble minde, & also by his kindnes: so that they presently forgate the daunger they were in, & prayd him to commaund their persons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible Captaine, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to dye obeying his counsell, then to saue them selues, forsaking so valliant and worthy a man. Then, when one of the assembly made a motion that they should make their bondmen free, & that diuers also did confirme it, Cato sayd he would by no meanes suffer it, because it was neither meete nor lawfull: howbeit if their maisters would manumitt them, that he was contented to receiue the for souldiers, that could weare any weapon. Diuers promised him to do it: & Cato commaunded their names should be enrolled that would, & so went his way. Immediately after, letters were brought him from king Iuba, & Scipio: of the which, king Iuba was hidden in a mountaine with few men with him, who sent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he went to forsake VTICA, he would tary him there: & if otherwise he determined to keepe VTICA, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on the other side riding at ancker, at a point of the land not farre from VTICA, staid for the like answer. Then Cato thought it best to stay the messengers which had brought him their letters, till he saw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROME, were verie glad men, & did presently make their bondmen free, & gaue them weapons. But the other three hundred which were marchant venterers, & that liued by vsury & exchange, who had the most parte of their goods in slaues & bondmen, did not long follow Catoes counsell: but like men, whose bodies soone receiue heate, & are soone cold againe, when they are once gone from the fire: euen so those marchants, while Cato was present among them, had some good pretty will & desire: but when by them selues they had cast their accopt, the feare they had of Caesar, made them forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, & vnto their duty. For, sayd they, what are we, & what is he whom we disdaigne to obey? Is it not Caesar, him selfe, who at this day is Lord & Emperor of ROME? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, nor Cato: & yet now, when all men for feare (& in manner compelled) do yeld & submit the selues, we will nedes take vpon vs within the wals of VTICA to fight for the liberty of ROME against him, for whom, Cato flying with Pompey, forsooke ITALIE: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Caesar, hauing no better liberty our selues, then it pleaseth him to geue vs. Let vs therefore now know our selues whilst we haue time, & craue mercie at his handes that is the stronger, & send vnto him, to pray him to pardon vs. The greatest & wisest men of those three hundred marchants, had this speache. But the most parte of them sought meanes how to entrappe the Senators, hoping the better of mercie at Caesars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto him. Cato did looke for this change in them, but yet vetered not that he thought, & returned the messengers backe againe vnto king Iuba, and Scipio, and wrote vnto them: that they should beware they came not neere VTICA, because he did mistrust these three hundred marchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had escaped from the battell, who coming towards VTICA, sent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one selfe determination from all the company. For some of them went to go vnto king Iuba, others also to ioyne with Cato, & parte of them were afraid to come into VTICA. These things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commaunded Marcus Rubrius to take care of these three hundred men, & to receiue the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumitted, without compelling of any man. In the meane time, Cato with all the Senators went out of VTICA to meete with these horsemen, & there he spake to the Capitaines, & praid them that they would not forsake so many noblemen & Senators of ROME as were there: & that they would not haue king Iuba for their Captaine before Cato, but to come into VTICA: where they might saue the selues the citie was of such strength, and besides, so well armed and vittelled for many yerres. The like A request did the Senators also make vnto them, with the teares running downe their cheekes. Thereupon the Capitaines went & spake with their souldiers. Cato in the meane time fate him downe on a litle hill, with the Senators, tarying for answer. But then on the sodaine came Rubrius vnto him in great hast, complaining of the tumult of these three hundred marchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: whereupon, the rest their harts failing them, fell to bewaile their miserable fortune. But Cato sought to comfort them, and then sent vnto the three hundred marchantes, to pray them to haue a litle patience. So the Capitaines returned againe with vnreasonable demaundes of the horsemen. For they sayd, that they cared not for king Iubas pay, neither were they affrayed of Casars malice, so that they had Cato for their general: yet to be pende vp within the walls of a citie with AFRICANES, that were PHOENICIANES, and a traitorous nation as could be: that grieved them most of all. For, sayd they, though now they sturre not, and be quiet: yet when Cesar comes, they will be the first that will betray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato would haue them to ioyne with him in this warre: that he should either kill or driue away all the VTICANES out of the citie, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleere of all those barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condicion, neuertheles he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and so returning againe into VTICA, he spake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerence vnto Cato, dissembeling no longer, said openly, that they would not like of him whatsoever he were, that should compel them to make warre with Cesar, both because they would not, nor could not doe it. Further, there were some of them that mumbled to them selues, that the Senators should be kept there, till Cesar came. Cato overheard them, for in deede his hearing was not very quicke. At that very instant one came to him, and tolde him, that the horsemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing least these three hundred marchants would lay hands upon the Senators: he went vnto them him selfe with his friends, and perceiuing they were gone a great way off, he tooke his horse and rode after them. They reioycing to see him come, receiued him among them, and prayed him to saue him selfe with them. But Cato prayed them againe to saue the Senators, & that with such affection, as it forced teares in him, besides, he held vp his hands vnto them, tooke their horses by the bridles, & them selues by their weapons, that at length he obtained of them, that they would remaine there one daye at the least, to helpe the Senators to saue them selues. So Cato returning with them into the city, he appointed some of them to ward at the gates, & put others also in garison into the castell: so that the three hundred marchants quaked for feare, least he would haue bene reuenged of them, because of their returne with him. Thereupon they sent vnto Cato, humbly to praye him to come vnto them in any case. But the Senators flocking about him, would not suffer him to go, & said, that they would not cast away their sauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doutles, all that were within VTICA, plainly saw the vertue & simplicitie of Cato, and found that there was no fraude nor deceite in him: who hauing long time refused to kill him selfe, he only tooke that extreme paines & care for others that their liues being saued, he might then rid him selfe of his owne. For men might easily see, though he dissembled it, that he was refused to dye. Whereupon, hauing comforted the Senators, he yielded vnto the requests of the three hundred marchants, & went him selfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his coming, and prayed him to commaund them, & boldly to trust them: so that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pity of their faint hartes, though they were not so constant & noble minded as he. For they were determined to fend vnto Cesar, specially to intreate him for him: and if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were assured they could haue none for them selues, and therefore would fight for the safety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wills, answered: that they should fend quicke to craue pardon for them selues, but to aske none for him. For sayd he, men that be overcome, & haue offended, it standeth them vpon to make humble sute, and to craue pardon: but for him selfe, he was neuer offender in his life, and yet had overcome as much as he desired, and had alwayes bene better then Cesar in iustice, who only (not him selfe) was now taken and overcome: the thing being apparently

Cato an earnest suitor for the Senators.

The sinceritie of Cato.

Catoes mind unconquerable.

A apparently proued in fight against him, which he had alwaies denied to haue practised against his contry. When he had made this answer vnto the three hundred marchants, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Cesar was in his way with all his armie, coming towards VTICA: O goddes, sayd he, then he cometh against vs, as against men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counsell quicke to saue them selues, whilest the horsemen were yet in the city. So shutting all the gates of the city, sauing that towards the hauen: he appointed shippes for them all, and set euery thing at a stay, without tumult or disorder, no man hauing iniurie offered him, and gaue euery one money to make way for their safetie. When Marcus Octavius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) sent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two should be General: he made no answer, but turning to his friends said: How can we wonder any more that all goeth to wracke with vs, sith there is suche ambition amongst vs for the gouernment, euen now, when we are at the last cast? In the meane time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoyling of the citizens goods, as a lawfull pray in warre. He straight ran thither him selfe, and the first he met withall, he tooke from them that they had gotten. The rest, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, & hanging downe their heades for shame, they went their way, and said nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to intence nor moue Cesar against the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for the all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there embracing his friends, & taking his leaue of them all, he brought them to their shippes. Now for his sonne, he did not couisell him to go, neither did he thinke it mete to vrge him to forsake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius, a young man in his companie, of a noble corage, that was determined to follow the inuincible constancy of Cato: who counsellled him to take the sea, and to saile away with the rest, because he knew he was Casars mortall enemy. Statilius said he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides: a Stoick Philosopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetic Philosopher, said you must take this stowt young man, to perswade him to obey vnto necessity. Cato him selfe in the meane time fate away the rest, & did minister iustice vnto them that required it: spending all that night, & the next day, about those matters. Then Lucius Cesar, the kinsman of Iulius Cesar the conqueror, being chosen by the three hundred, to goe & make lute vnto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he should say vnto Cesar for them all: and as for thee, Cato, said he, I will kisse his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreate him for thee. Nay said Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would saue my life by Casars grace, I could do it, if I would but go vnto him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyrant for iniustice. For it is an iniustice in him to take vp of him, as a Lord & soueraigne to saue a mans life, when him selfe hath no authority to commaund. But yet let vs consider if thou wilt, what thou shalt say, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together considering the matter, and in fine, Lucius Cesar being ready to departe, Cato recommended his sonne and frendes vnto him, and embracing him, tooke his leaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his sonne and frendes before him, and talking of many matters: among others he charged his sonne in no case to meddle in thaffaires of the common wealth. For said he, to deale vprightly like Catoes sonne, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it: and contrarily, obseruing the time, thou canst not do like an honest man. Towards evening he went into his bath to washe him selfe, and as he was a bathing, thinking upon Statilius, he cried out aloud: well Apollonides, thou hast at length yet perswaded Statilius, to goe his way and pulled downe his stowt courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? How? gone sayd Apollonides: Nay, his hart is now more stowt and courageous then euer it was, notwithstanding all the perswasions we could vse vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take such part as thou doest. After he had bathed him selfe, he went to supper, & fate at his meate, as he had alwaies vsed after the battell at Pharsalia, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed. So he had all his friends, & the chiefe Magistrats of VTICA to supper with him. After supper, they fell into graue talke and matters of Philosophie: till at length they came vnto the straunge opinion of the Stoick Philosophers, which was this: that only the good man is free, and all the euill be slaues. The Peripateticke Philosopher that was present there, was straight against it.

Cato representeth the ambition of men.

Statilius, a follower of Cato.

Cato would not haue pardon begged of Cesar for him.

Cato forbade his sonne to meddle with matters of state in a corrupt time.

But Cato was very earnest against the Peripateticke, and argued the matter a long time, with a vehement speech and contention: inſomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to ende his life, & to rid him ſelfe out of all thoſe troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and ſawe that euery man helde his peace, and looked ſadly of it: to comfort them againe, and to put the ſuſpicion of his death out of their heades: he beganne againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and ſeemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affrayed leaſt ſome miſfortune were come vnto them upon the ſea, or vnto them that were gone by land, becauſe they paſſed through deſertes, where there was no water to be had. Now when ſupper was done, and the ſtraungers gone, he walked as his manner was with his friends, and hauing taken order with the Captaines of the watch for matters of ſeruiſe, as the time required: going into his chamber he embraced his ſonne and his friendes more louingly then he was wont to doe, whereby he made them againe ſuſpect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and layed in his bedde, he tooke Platoes dialogues in his hand, treating of the ſoule, and red the moſt parte of it. Then looking by his beds ſide, and miſſing his ſword (which his ſonne had taken from him when he was at ſupper) he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his ſword away: his man made him no aunſwere, & he fell againe to read his booke. Then a prety while after, not ſeeming to be importunate, or ouerhaſtie of the matter, but as though he would only know what became of it: he willed the to bring him his ſword againe. They taried long, and he had red ouer all the booke, but yet his ſword was not brought him againe. Whereupon he called for all his men one after an other, & very angrily asked them his ſword, & gaue one of them ſuch a blow in the face, that his noſe fell a bleeding, & his hand was all bloody withal, and cried out that his ſonne and his ſeruants would deliuer him naked into the hands of his enemy: vntill his ſonne and friends at length ranne vnto him, & falling downe on their knees, lamented, and beſought him to be contented. Cato then riſing out of his bedde, looked grimly vpon them, and ſayd vnto them: O goddes, who euer ſaw me in this taking? Why doth no man by reaſon perſwade me, if they fee me out of the way: & not to keepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeſt thou not bind thy father (my ſonne) his hands behinde him, that when Cæſar commeth, he may finde me in caſe not to defend my ſelfe? I doe not deſire my ſworde to hurte my ſelfe, for if I had any ſuche minde, I neede but hold my breath a litle, or geue but a knocke of my head againſt the wall onely, and diſpatche my ſelfe quickly. When he had ſayd thus, his ſonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his friends alſo, no man remayning with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he ſpake more gently, and reaſoned in this ſorte. What, doe you thinke to keepe an old man as I am, aliue by force? And haue you taried behinde but to ſit ſtaring apone me, and ſay nothing vnto me? If otherwiſe elſe, by reaſon you come to perſwade me, that it ſhall be no ſhame for Cato, diſpairing of the ſafetye of his life, to ſeek it by the grace and mercy of his enemy: why then doe you not now tell me your reaſons to perſwade me, that forſaking all other fancieſ & determinatioſ which hetherunto we haue holden for good, being on a ſodaine become wiſer by Cæſars meanes, we ſhould be bound the more therefore to geue him thanks? I do not tell you this that I haue determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I liſt) to put the thing in execution I haue determined: but yet I will conſult with you, when I am ſo determined, to heare the reaſons and opinion of your bookes, which your ſelues doe vſe in diſcourſe and argument together. Goe your way therefore hardily vnto my ſonne, and tell him, that he muſt not thinke to compell his father vnto that, which he can not proue good vnto him by reaſon. After this talke, Demetrius and Apollonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his chamber. Then his ſword was brought him by a litle boy: When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his ſword was ſharpe, and would cut: when he ſaw it was well, O ſayd he, now I am where I would be, and ſo laying downe the ſword naked by him, he tooke his booke againe in his hand, and red it ouer (as they ſay) twiſe together. Then he ſlept ſo ſoundly after it, that his men which were without his chamber heard him ſnore againe. About midnight, he called for two of his freemen, Cleantes his Philitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his weightieſt affaires of the common wealth.

Cato conſidered his friends wherewith he killed him ſelfe.

So he ſent him vnto the hauen to ſee, if all his men that were imbarcked were under ſaile: and gaue his hand vnto the Philitian to be bound vp, becauſe it was ſwollen with the blow he gaue one of his ſlaues when he big him on the face. All his ſeruants were glad to heare of that, hoping then that he deſired to liue. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craſſus, who ſtayed about ſome buſines he had, and yet that he was going to take ſhippe: howbeit that the ſea was very rough and wande exceeding great. Cato hearing this, ſighed, being ſory for them that were vpon the ſea, and ſent Butas backe againe to the hauen, to ſee if any man came backe for any matter they had to ſay vnto him. The litle birdes began to chirpe, and Cato ſet againe in a litle ſlumber. But thereupon Butas returned, & brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, & there was no ſturre. Then Cato bad him goe his way, and ſhut to the doore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had meant to haue ſlept out all the reſt of the night. But Butas backe was no ſooner turned, but Cato taking his naked ſword in his hand, thruſt it into his breaſt: howbeit the ſwelling of his hand made the blowe ſo weake, that it killed him not preſently, but drawing on to his later ende, he fell downe vpon his bedde, and made ſuch a noyſe with his fall (ouerthrowing a litle table of geometry hard by his bedde, that his ſeruants hearing the noyſe, gaue a great ſhreeke for feare. Thereupon his ſonne and his friendes ranne into the chamber, and found him all of a gore blood, and the moſt part of his bowells coming out of his body, him ſelfe being yet aliue, and ſeeing them. They were all ſtricken with ſuch ſorow to behold it, that at the firſt they were ſo amaſed, as they could not tel what to ſay to it. His Philitian comming to him, he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not perſhed, and to looſe up his wound. But Cato comming to him ſelfe, thruſt backe the Philitian, and tare his bowells with his owne handes, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue vp the ghoſt. Whereupon the three hundred ROMANS (in leſſe time then a man would haue thought Cato's owne houſhold ſeruants could haue knowne of his death) were at his dores, and immediatly after, all the people of VTICA alſo came thither, and with one voyce called Cato their benefactor and ſauior, and ſayd he onely was a free man, and had an inuincible minde: and this was done, when they heard ſay that Cæſar was not farre from VTICA. Furthermore, neither feare of the preſent danger, nor the deſire to flatter the Conqueror, neither any priuate quarrell amongelt them ſelues, could keepe them from honoring Cæſar's funeralls. For ſumptuouſly laying out his body, and honorably accompanying his funeralls as might be, they buryed him by the ſea ſide, where at this preſent time it is to be ſeene his image, holding a ſworde in his hand. After that, they made their beſt way to ſaue them ſelues and their cite. Nowe Cæſar beinge aduertized by them that came vnto him, howe Cato ſturred not from VTICA, nor fled not, but ſent all others away, ſauing him ſelfe, and his ſonne, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing: he could not deuſe what he meant by it. Therefore eſteeming Cato much, he made haſte with all the ſpeede he could with his armie, to come thither. But when he viddeſt tooke that Cato had ſlaine him ſelfe, writers doe reporte he ſayd thus: O Cato, I enuy thy death, ſithe thou haſt enuid mine honor to ſaue thy life. For in deede, had Cato bene contented, Cæſar ſhould haue ſaued his life, he had not ſo much impaired his owne honor, as he had augmented Cæſar's glory. And yet what Cæſar would haue done, men make it doubtful, ſaying that they coniecture well of Cæſar's clemencie. Cato dyed when he was but eight and forty yeare old. For his ſonne, Cato neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him, that he was very idle, giuen, and laſciuious beſides: For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in a noble mans houſe of the kings blood, called Maphradates, who had a ſayre woman to his wife: he taried longer then he might well with honeſtie, whereupon he fell to be a laughing ſtocke to the people, and in mockery they ſayd, Cato will goe too morrow, a thirty dayes hence, and another, that Maphradates and Porcius were two good friends, but they haue but one minde. And the reaſon was, becauſe Maphradates wife was called Psyche, which in the Greeke ſignifieth minde: and Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind, howbeit his famous death did droppe this in Cæſar's ſpeech. For he valiantly fighting againſt Auguſtus, and Antoni, at the battell of Philippes, for the libertie of his countie: their armie beinge ouerthrowen and ſed, he would neither ſie nor hide him ſelfe, but running in amongelt his enemies, he made them knowe that he was, by incouraging those of his side, which yet did defend them selues, till he was slayne in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia, the Daughter of Cato, gave no place vnto her father, nether for chastitie, nor greatnes of mind. For she being married vnto Brutus, who slue Cæsar, was of the conspiracie, and slue her selfe as courageously as became the vertue and nobilitie of her bloud from whence she came, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius also, who had sayd he would ronne Cato's fortune (as we haue tolde you before) was kept from killing of him selfe by the Philosophers, Demetrius, and Apollonides. But after that tyme hauing shewed him selfe very faithfull and seruiceable vnto Brutus in all his affayres, he was slayne in the field also at the battell of Philippes.

AGIS AND CLEOMENES.

The fable of Ision against ambitious persons.

Ruely the fable of Ision was not ill deuised against ambitious persons who imbracing a clowde for the goddesse Iuno, begot (as it is sayd) the CENTAURI. For euen so ambitious men, imbracing glory for the true image of vertue, doe neuer any acte that is good nor perfect: but being carried away with diuers fancies, and following others humors with desire to please the people, they may, as the herdmen in the tragedy of Sophocles (speaking of their cattell) say:

YVe vvaunt vpon their beasts, though vve be their Maisters bee, And vverebesener they become, there also followe vvee.

Such in deede are they compared to, that gouerne common weales, after peoples lust and fancy: who doubles, are as their seruants obedient at call, because they onely may enjoy the glorious tide and name of an Officer. For like as in a shippe the Mariners that stand in the prow, doe better see before them, then the Pilots that steere the helme in the poepe, and yet lookes alwayes backe vnto them to see what they commaunde: euen so, they that gouerne in the common wealth for hono: sake, are no better the honorable flauers of the people, hauing no more but the bare name of a gouernor. But in deede, the perfect good and honest man should neuer conet outward glory, but as a meane to bringe him to noble attempts, whereby

As he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a younge man that coueteth honor by vertue, giue him leaue a litle to glory in his well doing: for, as Theophrastus sayth, vertue buddeth and flourisheth in youth, and taketh fast roote by prayes giuen, as wit & corage groweth in them. But ouermuch praise is dangerous in euery person, but chiefly in ambitious gouernors. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many desperat partes: for they wil not allow that honor proceedes of vertue, but that honor is vertue it selfe. But in deede they should say as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requested an vnlawfull matter of him: Thou canst not, said he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be sayd vnto the people: you can not both haue one, a Maister and a seruauant, that can commaunde and obey together. Or els the mischief spoken of in the tale of the Dragon must needs happen, which was: the taile on a time fell out with the head, and complained, saying it would another while go before, & would not alwaies come behind. The head graunted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing howe to guide the heade, and besides that the head thereby was tormented euery way, being compelled against nature to follow that part and member, which could nether heare, nor see how to guide it. The like matter haue we seene happen vnto many, which in the administraction of the common wealth, did seeke to please the humors of the multitude. For when they haue once put their heads vnder their girdles to please the common people, which without cause & reason doe soone rebell: they can by no possible meanes afterwards bridle their furie & insolencie. Now the reason that made vs to enter into discourse against the ambition and vaine glorye amongst the people: was the consideration I had of their great power, remembering the misfortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracchi: bothe the which comming of a noble house, and hauing bene maruelous well brought vp, & maneing also the affayres of the common wealth with a good desire, were notwithstanding in the ende cast away: not so much through couetousnes of glorye, as for feare of dishonor, which came also of no base mind. For they hauing receiued great pleasures and friendships of the people, were ashamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earnestly sought to exceede the people in good will, by new decrees and denises, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their partes contended to honor them the more, by how much they strived to shewe them selues thankfull. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people also to honor them, were vnwares so entangled with publike causes, D that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which sayth:

Although our deedes discent from equitie, Yet can vve not desist vvvith honestie.

This thou shalt easily finde by the declaration of the historie. With these we doe compare two other popular men, both kinges of Lacedæmon, Agis and Cleomenes. For they, as the Gracchi, seeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the iust and honest gouernment againe of the common wealth of Lacedæmon, which of long time had bene out of vse: did in like manner purchase the hate of the nobilitie, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted couetousnes. In deede these two LACONIANS were no brethre borne, but yet did both follow one selfe course & forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this sort. After that couetousnes of gold and siluer crept againe into the cite of SPARTA, and with riches, couetousnes also and miserie, and by vse, voluptuousnes and licentious life: SPARTA then was void of all honor and goodnes, and was long time drowned in shame and dishonor, vntill king Agis and Leonidas came to raigne there. Agis was of the house of the Eurytionides, the sonne of Eudamidas, the sixt of lineall descent after Agisilaw, who had bene the greatest Prince of all GREECE in his time. This Agisilaw had a sonne slaine in ITALY by the MESSAPIANS, called Archidamus, before the cite of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had issue two sonnes, Agis, and Eudamidas that was king, who succeeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater slue before the cite of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas also begat Agis, whose life we F now write of. Leonidas also, the sonne of Cleonymus, was of the other familie of the Agides, the eight of succession after Pausanias, who slue Mardonius, the kings Lieutenent general of PERSIANS, in a battell fought before the cite of PLATERS. This Pausanias had a sonne called Plisto-

max, and Plifonax also another, called Pausanias: who flying from SPARTA vnto the citie of AEGEA, his eldest sonne Agesspolis was made king in his fathers roome, who dying without issue, his yonger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the kingdō. Cleombrotus had two sonnes, Agesspolis and Cleomenes: of the which, Agesspolis reigned not long king, and dyed without issue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was king after him, had two sonnes, Acrotatus the elder, that dyed in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which suruiued him, and was not king, but one Areus his Nephewe, the sonne of Acrotatus. This Areus dyed before the citie of CORINTH: who hauing another Acrotatus to his sonne, he succeeded him in the kingdome. He also dyed at a battell before the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, and was slayne there by the tyrant Aristodemus, leauing his wife great with childe. She being brought to bedde after his death of a sonne, whome Leonidas the sonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp: the childe dying very young, the crowne by his death was caft upon Leonidas him selfe. Howbeit his maners & conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the common wealth, and cleane out of order: yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the ancient LACONIAN life, because he had bene long time brought vp in Princes houles, & followed also Seleucus Court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those Courts into GRÆCE, where law & reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not onely excel Leonidas, in honor and magnanimitie of mind: but all other almost also which had reigned in SPARTA, from the time of Agesslaus the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeare old, and being daintily brought vp with the finenes of two women, his mother Agessistris, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and siluer, then all the LACEDÆMONIANS els: he began to spurne against these womanish delights & pleasures, in making him selfe fayer to be the better beliked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell, and to caft vpon him a plaine spanish cape, taking pleasure in the dyet, bathes, and manner of the ancient LACONIAN life: and openly boasted besides, that he would not desire to be king, but onely for the hope he had to restore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authority. Then began the state of LACEDÆMON first to be corrupted, and to leaue her ancient discipline, when the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing subdued the Empire of the ATHENIANS, stored them selues & contrie both, with plenty of gold & siluer. But yet reseruing still the lands left vnto them by succession from their fathers, according vnto Lycorgus first ordinance & institution, for diuision of the landes amongst them: which ordinance, and equalitie being inuolably kept amongst them, did yet preserve the common wealth from defamiation of diuers other notorious crimes. Vntil the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a seditious man, and of proude conditions: who bitterly falling out with his own sonne, preferred a law, that euery man might lawfully giue his landes and goods whilest he liued, or after his death by testament, vnto any man whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this man made this law to satisfie his anger, & others also did confirme it for couetousnes sake, and so ouerthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy landes of numbers, and so transferred it from the right & lawful heires whereby a few men in short time being made very rich, immediately after there fell out great pouertie in the citie of SPARTA, which made all honest sciences to cease, & brought in there-upon vnlawfull occupations, who enuyed them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not aboue seuen hundred naturall Citizens of SPARTA in all, & of them, not aboue a hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the rest were poore people in the citie, and were of no countenance nor calling, & besides that, went vnnwillingly to the warres against their enemies, looking euery day for sturre and chaunge in the citie. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good acte (as in deede it was) to replenish the citie of SPARTA againe, and to bringe in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the Citizens. He found the youth (against all hope) to giue good eare vnto him, and very well giuen vnto vertue, easily chaunging their garments & life, to recouer their libertie againe. But the oldest men, which were now euen rotten with couetousnes and corruption, they were afraid to returne againe to the straight ordinances of Lycorgus, as a slaue and ronnegate from his Maister, that trembleth when he is brought back againe vnto him. Therefore they reprobued Agis, when he did lament before them their present miserable estate, and wihed also for the former ancient honor and true dignitie of SPARTA.

Howbeit

A Howbeit Lysander the sonne of Lybius, and Mandroclidas the sonne of Eephames, and Agesslaus also, greatly commended his noble desire, and perswaded him to goe forward withall. This Lysander was of great authoritie and estimation amongst them in the citie: Mandroclidas was also very wise, and carefull about any matter of counsell, and with his wisdom and policy, very valiant: Agesslaus in like manner, the kings Vncle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couetous, and yet prickt forward to giue his furtherance in this attempt as it appeared, by his sonne Hippomedon, who was a notable good fouldier, and could doe very much, by meanes of the loue and good will the younge men did beare him. But in deede, the secret cause that brought Agesslaus to consent vnto this practise, was the greatnes of his dette which he ought, of the which he hoped to be discharged by chaunging of the state and common wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he fought by his meanes to drawe his mother also vnto the matter, which was Agesslaus sister. She could doe very much by the number of her friendes, followers, and detters in the citie, by whose meanes she ruled the most part of the affaires of the citie after her owne pleasure. But the younge man Hippomedon making her priuie vnto it, at the first she was amazed withall, and bad him hold his peace if he were wise, and not meddle in matters vnpossible and vnprofitable. But when Agesslaus had told her what a notable acte it would be, and how easily it might be brought to passe, with maruelous great profit: and that king Agis beganne also to strayne her with great intreatie, that she would willingly depart with her goods to winne her sonne honor and glory: who, though he could not in money and riches come to be like vnto other kinges (because the slaues and factors onely of the kinges C Seleucus and Pholomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that euer reigned) yet if in temperance, thriftines, & noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he should come to restore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe vnto equalitie: that then in deede he should be counted a noble king. These women being stirred vp with ambition by these perswasions of the younge man, seeing him so nobly bent, as if by the goddes their mindes had secretly bene inflamed with the loue of vertue: did presently alter their mindes in such sort, that they them selues did prick forward Agis, and sent for their friends to pray and intreatie them to fauor his enterprise: and furthermore, they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer heare and beleue their wiues, suffering them to vnderstand more of the affaires of the state, then they them selues did of their priuate estate at home. Herein is to be considered, that the most part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the handes of the women, and therefore they were against it, not onely because thereby they were cut off from their finenes and excesses, in the which being ignorant of the true good in deede, they put all their felicitie: but also, because they sawe their honor and authoritie which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foote. Therefore they comming to Leonidas, they did perswade him to reprove Agis, because he was elder man then he, and to let that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the riche, but fearing the common people, who desired nothing but alteration, he durst not openly speake against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Agis practise, talking with the Magistrates of the citie, and accusing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the riche mens goods vnto the poore, the diuision of their landes, and the abolishing of all detts, for rewarde to put the tyrannie into his handes, and that thereby he got him a stronge gard vnto him selfe, but not many Citizens vnto SPARTA. This notwithstanding, king Agis hauing procured Lysander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preferred his lawe vnto the counsell. The articles whereof were these: That such as were in debt, should be cleered of all their detts, and that the landes also should be diuided into equall partes: so that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the citie of MALBA, and SELASTIA, there should be foure thousand five hundred partes, and without the se boundes, there should be in all the rest, fiftene thousand partes, the which should be distributed vnto their neighbours meete to cary weapon: and the rest vnto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbours and strangers in like manner, which should be very well brought vp, and be able men besides to serue the common wealth: all the which afterwards should be diuided into fiftene companies, of the which, some should receiue two hundred, & others foure hundred men, & should live according to the olde auncient institution obserued by their aunccestors. This lawe being a preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grew to diuers opinions upon it. Whereupon Lysander him selfe assembled the great counsell of all the people, and there spake vnto them him selfe, and Mandroclidas, and Agefilaw also, praying them not to suffer the honor of SPARTA to be troden vnder foote, for the vanitie of a fewe: but that they would remember the auncient oracles of the goddess, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and destruction of the common wealth: and of the late oracle also brought vnto them, from the temple of Paphia. The temple and oracle of Paphia, was famous at the cite of THALAMES: and some say, that Paphia was one of the Daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Iupiter, & was deliuered of a sonne called Hammon. Other thinke that it was Cassandra, one of king Priamus Daughters that died there, which was surnamed Paphia, because she gaue all the answers & oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth, that Daphné the Daughter of Amicyla, flying from Apollo that would haue rauished her, was turned into a lawrell tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of prophetic. So, they said that this oracle of the god commaunded them, that the SPARTANS should againe returne vnto their former auncient equalitie, stablished first by Lycurgus lawe. When euery man els had spoken, king Agis rising vp, briefly speaking vnto the people, sayd: that he would bestowe great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which he was desirous to restore againe. For first of all, he would make common all his errable and pasture he had, and besides that, he would adde to six hundred talents in ready money, and so much should his mother, grandmother, kinfemen and friends, all the which were the richest and wealthiest in SPARTA. When the people heard what he sayd, they marvelled much at the noble minde of this younge king, and were very glad of it, saying: that for three hundred yeares space together, the cite of SPARTA had not for worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily affayed with all his power he could to resist him, thinking with him selfe, that if king Agis purpose tooke place, he should also be compelled to doe as he did, and yet he should haue no thanks, but king Agis: because that all the SPARTANS indifferently should be compelled to make their goods in common, but the honor should be his onely that first beganne it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and iust man or not. Agis answered, that he had bene. Then replied Leonidas, did you euer see that he had taken away and abolished any detts, or had receyued strangers into the number of the Citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily thought his common wealth vnperfect, if all strangers were not banished the cite. Agis againe answered him: that he marvelled not that Leonidas being brought vp in a straung contry, and also married there in a noble mans house, he should be ignorant of Lycurgus lawes, who banishing gold and siluer out of his cite, did therewithall exile dette and lending. And for strangers, he hated them that would not conforme them selues vnto the manners and facions of life which he instituted, and those they were which he banished: not for any ill will he bare vnto their persons, but because he feared their manners of life, least that mingling them with the Citizens, they should make them runne after vanitie and couetousnes to be riche. For otherwise, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all strangers, were maruelously reuerenced and honored in SPARTAIN olde tyme, because they did singe in their writings, the selfe same things which Lycurgus had established in his lawes. And thou thy selfe also dost commend Eceprotes, being one of the Ephores, because he did cut with a hatchet the two stringes which Phrynis the Musitian had added vnto the Citherne, more then the seven common stringes, and those also which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reprovest me, because I goe about to roote out all excesse and pride out of SPARTA, as though those men did not farre of preuent that these superfluous stringes of the musick, delighting the Citizens mindes too much with their songes, should not cause them fall vnto such trade and manner of life, as should make the cite at discord with it selfe. After this contention, the common people did sticke vnto king Agis, and the riche men followed Leonidas, praying and perswading him not to forsake them: and further, they did fo incite the Senators, in whom consisteth the chiefe authority, to determine and digest all matters before they be propounded vnto the people: that they ouerthrow the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lysander who was yet in office, attempted to accuse Leonidas by an auncient

A nent lawe, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules should mary with any straung woman, nor beget children of her: and sayde further, that no man vpon payne of death should dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When he had instructed others to obiect these things agaynst Leonidas, he with one of his colleagues obserued a signe in the element, the ceremony wherof was in this sorte: Euery nynewth yeare, the Ephori chusing a bright night without moonelight, did sit downe in some open place, and beheld the starres in the element, to see if they saw any starre shoote from one place to another: if they did, then they accused their kinges that they had offended the goddess, and did deprime them of their kingdom, vntill some oracle came from DELPHES or Olympus, to restore them againe. Lysander then declaring that he had seene a starre sic in the element, did therefore accuse king Leonidas, and brought forth witness against him: how he had married a woman of ASIA, the which one of king Selenus Lieutenantenants had giuen him in marriage, & that he had two children by her: & afterwards being forsaken of his wife that refused him, he returned againe into his contry against his will, & so had possessed the kingdom for lacke of lawfull heire. So following his accusation in this manner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his sonne in law, being also of the kings blood, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being afraid of the successe hereof, tooke sanctuary in the temple of Iuno, surnamed Chalcocetor, & his Daughter with him, who forooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in person, & making default, they deposed him, & made Cleombrotus king. In the meane time Lysander's office expired, & the new Ephori which succeeded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accused Lysander & Mandroclidas, because against the law, they had abolished all detts, & had againe made newe diuision of lands. When they sawe they were openly accused, they incensed both the kinges, that ioyning together, they should make the Ephores ordinaunces of no effect: declaring, that their authority was onely erected for the discord of the two kinges, because they should giue their voices vnto that king that had the best iudgement & reason, wher the other would wilfully withstand both right & reason. And therefore, that they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controulment of any person: & that to resist the kinges was a breaking of the lawe, such that by right the Ephori had no other priuileage & authority, but to be iudges & arbitrators betweene kinges, when there was any cause of iarre or controuersie. Both the kinges being caried away by this perswasion, went into the market place accompanied with their friends, plucked the Ephores from their seats, & put others in their rooms, of the which Agefilaw was one. Furthermore, they armed a great number of yong men, & opening the prisons, did set the prisoners at liberty: the which made their aduersaries afraid of the doubling some great murder would haue followed vpon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Agefilaw being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled vnto the cite of TEGEA, & having also laid men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it, sent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, & they did accompany Leonidas, & brought him safely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purpose taking effect, & no man contrary to the one man only Agefilaw ouerthrow all, & dashed a noble LIACONIAN law by a shameful vice, which was couetousnes. For he being a great landed man, & hauing the best lands of any man in the contry, & owing a great summe of money besides: would nether pay his detts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he perswaded king Agis, that if he was about to stablish both together, he should raise a great vtore in the city, & whichall, if he did first winne them, that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting of of detts only: then that they would easily & willingly also accept the law for partition of lands. Lysander was also of his opinion, whether by king Agis & he both were deceived by Agefilaw subtlety. So they commaunded the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, & bills of dett (which the LIACONIAN do call Clararia) into the market place, and there laying them on a heape together, they did set fire of them. When the vturers & creditors saw their writings obligatory afire, they departed thence with heauy hearts: but Agefilaw mocking the said, he neuer saw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands also should be presently deuided, & the kinges likewise commaunding in Agefilaw stil interposing some cause of let, delayed time, vntill opportunity serued, that king Agis should go to the warres, for that the ACHAIANS their confederats had praied aide of LACEDÆMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betweene them, because they

Aratus, general of the Achaeans.

looked daily that the Aetolians coming through the contry of Megara, would invade Peloponnesus. Aratus general of the Achaeans had leaued a great army to withstand their inuasion, & had also written vnto the Ephores, that they should lend the aide. Whereupon, they presently sent king Agis, perceiuing also the readines and good wil of the fouldiers which were appointed to go with him. For the most of the were young men & needy, who feing the felues discharged of the feare of their detts, & hoping also at their return, that the lads likewise should be deuided among the they went with glad harts, & were obedient vnto king Agis. So that the cities where through they passed, wondred how they came through all Peloponnesus, from the one side to the other, very quietly, without noyse or offence to any man. Likewise many Grecians calling to mind the auncient times, told one another, that it was a noble fight then to see the army of Lacedaemon, whē they were led by Agisilaus, Lyfander, &c. Leonidas, famous captains: sith now they saw so great obedience vnto Agis by his fouldiers, who was in maner the yōgest mā of all his campe. Who also glorying to be cōtēt with litle, to away with paines, & not to be more costly apparelled & armed the any priuat fouldier he had: he wanne him self therby a maruelous loue of the people. Howbeit the rich mē liked not this chaung, & were afraid lest Agis should giue other people example to rise also, & to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meting with Aratus by the city of Corinth, euen as he was consulting whether he should fight with his enemy or not: he wēd him self in his couēl, then no rash, but a resolute & valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, & not to suffer the warre to come any further, leauing the entry into Peloponnesus free to their enemy: neuertheles, that he would do what Aratus thought good, because he was the elder, and general also of the Achaeans, whom he came not to cōmand, but to aide the. But Baton Senoplian writeth, that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not red that which Aratus had writte for his excuse & iustificatiō, alleaging there, that the farmers & husbandē hauing brought all the come into their barnes, he thought it better to suffer the enemies to come further into the contry, rather then to hazard battel, to the losse of the whole cōtry of Peloponnesus, & that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart, & brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home again, greatly honored of all the that serued with him in this iorney, finding the city of Sparta the in great broile & trouble. For Agisilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding him self rid of the feare which before kept him vnder: cared not what iniury or mischief he did to any citizen, so he might get money. For amongst other things, that very yere he made the pay beyond all reason the tallages & taxes due vnto the cōmō wealth for thirtene moneths, adding to the thirteenth moneth, about the ordinary time of the yere. Wherefore perceiuing euery mā hated him, & being afraid of the he had offended: he kept fouldiers about him, armed with their swords, & so came downe into the market place among the. And for the two kings, he made no accōpt of the one: but of the other that was Agis, he sēmed outwardly to make good accōpt, rather for kinreds sake, the for his dignity of a king, & furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yere following. Whereuppon, his enemies spēdely to preuent the daūger, gathered force together, & openly brought king Leonidas from Tegea, to restore him again to his kingdō. The people were glad to see that, because they were angry they had bene mocked in that sort, for that the landes were not deuided according vnto promise. Furthermore, Hippomedon was so well beloued for his valiantnes of euery mā, that intreating the people for his father Agisilaus, he saued his life, & got him out of the city. But for the two kings, Agis tooke sanctuary in the tēple of Iuno Chalciceas. And Cleobrotus the other king fled into the tēple of Neptune: for it sēmed that Leonidas being much more offēded with him, did let king Agis alone, & wēt against him with certē soldiers armed. The he sharply taunted him, that being his sonne in law, he had conspired against him to depriue him of his kingdō, & had driue him out of his contry. But then Cleobrotus wot hauing a word to say, late stil, & made him no answer. Whereuppon his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offēded for the iniury they did her father, & had left her husband Cleobrotus, that had vsurped the kingdō from him, to serue her father in his aduersity, and while he was in sanctuary tooke part with him also of his misery, & afterwards whē he wēt vnto the city of Tegea, were blacks for sorow, being offēded with her husband the contrary the chaunging chaunging her anger with her husband's fortune & misery, became also an humble suter with him sitting down by him, & embracing him, hauing her two lide sonnes on either side of them. All mē wōdering, & weping for pity, to see the goodnes & naturall loue of this Lady, who shewing her mourning apparell, & heare of her head flaring about her eyes, bare headed: the speake in this sort vnto her father. O father mine, this forswill garnēt & countenance is not for pity of Cleobrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting fore your former misery & exile: but now, which of the two should I rather choofe, either to cōtinue a mourner in this pitifull state, seing you again restored to your kingdom, hauing overcome your enemies: or els putting on my princely apparell, to see my husband slaine, vnto whom you married me a maid? who, if he can not moue you to take cōpassion of him, and to obtēin mercy, by the teares of his wife and childre: he shal then abide more bitter paine of his euil counsel, then that which you intend to make him suffer. For he shal see his wife die before him, whom he loueth more derely then any thing in the world. Also, with what face can I loke apōn other ladies, whē I could neuer bring my father to pity, by any intercessiō I could make for my husband, neither my husband, intreating him for my father: & that my hap is to be borne, a daughter & wife, alwayes most vnfortunate, & depised of mine owne? And for my husband, if he had any reason to do that he did, I the tooke it from him, by taking your parte, and protesting against him: and contrarily, your selfe doth giue him honest culler to excuse his fault, when he seeth in you the desire of the kingdom so great, that for the loue thereof, you thinke it lawfull to kill your sonnes in law, and also not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her sake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this sorte, putting her face vpon Cleobrotus head, cast her swollen and blubbering eyes apōn the standers by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friendes, he commaunded Cleobrotus to get him thence, and to leaue the cite as an exile: and prayed his Daughter for his sake to reuērsē vnto him, and not to forsake her father, that did so dearely loue her, as for her sake he had saued her husbands life. This notwithstanding, she would not yeelde to his request: but rising vp with her husband, gaue him one of his sonnes, and her self tooke the other in her armes: and then making her prayer before the altar of the goddesse, she went as a banished woman away with her husband. And truly the example of her vertue was so famous, that if Cleobrotus mind had not bene too much blinded with vain glory, he had cause to thinke his exile farre more happy, to enioye the loue of so noble a wife as he had, then for the kingdom which he possessed without her. Then Leonidas hauing banished king Cleobrotus out of the city, & remouing the first Ephores, had substituted other in their place: he presētly berought him howe he might craftily come by king Agis. First, he perswaded him to come out of the sanctuary, & to gouerne the kingdom safely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgien him all that was past, because they knew he was deceiued, & subtly circumuēced by Agisilaus craft: beistig a young man, ambitious of honor: Agis would not leaue the sanctuary for Leonidas cunning perswasion, but mistrusted all that he said vnto him: Wherefore, Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares, &c. Arcefilas, did oftē times go to visiting Agis, & other while also they got him out of the sanctuary with them vnto the bath, & brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares E hauing borrowed not long before, certē rich apparell & plate of Agisilaus, because he would not redeliuer the againe, he determined to betray king Agis, his mother, & grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did serue Leonidas turne, & prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) against Agis. Now therefore, Agis keeping all the rest of his time within the temple, sauing when he went apōn occasion to the bath: they determined to intercept him by the way, & to take him when he was out of the sanctuary. So they watched him one day when he bathed, & came & slaued him as their maner was, & sēmed to accompany him, sporting, & being merry with him, as with a young man their familien. But when they came to the turning of a streete that went towards the prison, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, said vnto him: I arrest thee Agis, & wil bring thee before the Ephores, to giue accōpt of thy doings in the common wealth. Then Demochares, which was a great mighty man cast his gowne ouer his eares, & pulled him forward: others also thrust him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no mā being near them to help Agis, they got him into prison. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of souldiers that were strangers, & beset the prison round about. The Ephores wēt into the prison, & sent vnto some of the Senate to come vnto them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they commaunded Agis, if it had bene iudicially, to giue account of the alteration he had made in the cōmon wealth. The younge man laughed at their hypocrisie. But Amphares told him that it was no laughing sport, & that he should pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores seeming to deale more favorably with him, & to shew him a way how he might escape the cōdemnation for his fault, asked him, if he had not bene intitled vnto it by Agessius, and Lysander. Agis answered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the steppes of the auncient Lycurgus, bringing the common wealth vnto the former estate of his graue ordinance & institution. Then the same Senator asked him againe, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The younge man boldly answered him, that he would neuer repent him of so wise and vertuous an enterprise, though he ventred his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commaunded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the prison where they were strangled, that were condemned to dye. Demochares perceiuing the Sergeants durst not lay hold of him, & likewise that the souldiers which were strangers, did abhorre to commit such a fact, contrary to the law of God and man, to lay violent hands vpon the person of a king: he threatened & reuiled them, and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ranne straight through the cite, that king Agis was taken, & a multitude of people were at the prison dores with lights & torches. Thither came also king Agis mother & grandmother, shrieking out, & praying that the king of SPARTA might yet be heard and iudged by the people. For this cause, they hastned his death the sooner, and were afraid besides, least the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, spied a Sergeant lamenting & weeping for him, vnto whom he said: good fellowe, I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am harder man then they that so shamefully put me to death, & with those words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the prison into the street, found Agessistrata there, king Agis mother, who straight fel downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe, in old familiar manner, as being her very friend, told her that they should doe king Agis no hurt, & that (he might if he would, goe & see him. Then she prayed, that they would also let her mother in with her. Amphares sayde, with a good will: and so put them both into the prison house, and made the dores be shut after them. But when they were within, he first gaue Archidamus vnto the Sergeants to be put to death, who was a maruelous olde woman, and had liued more honorably vnto that age, then any Lady or Matrone beside her in the cite. She being executed, he commaunded Agessistrata also to come in. Who when she sawe the bodye of her dead sonne layed on the ground, & her mother also hanging on the gallowes: she did her selfe helpe the hangman to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her sonnes. Then hauing couered her in decent manner, she layed her downe on the ground by the corps of her sonne Agis, and kissing his cheeke sayd: out, alas my sonne, thy great modestie, goodnes and clemencie, brought thee and vs vnto this deathe. Then Amphares peeping in at the dore to see what was done, hearing what she sayde, came in withall in a greate rage, and sayde: I perceyue thou hast albeene of counsell with thy sonne, and sith it is so, thou shalt also followe him. Then she rising likewise to be strangled, sayd: the goddes graunt yet that this may profit SPARTA. This horrible murder beeing blowne abroad in the cite, and the three dead bodies also brought out of prison: the feare though it were great amongst the people, could not keepe them back from apparant shew of griefe, and manifest hate against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was neuer a more wicked and crueller fact committed in SPARTA, since the DORIAN came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies them selues in battell, would not willingly lay hands vpon the kings of LACEDÆMON, but did forbear as much as they could possible, both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maiestie. For in many great battells & conflicts which the LACEDÆMONIANS had against the GRÆCIANS, there was neuer any king of LACEDÆMON slain, before Philips time, but Cleobrotus only, who was slain with a dart at the battell of LEVCTRES. Some write also, that the MESSENIANS hold opiniō, that their Arifomenes

Not the reuerent regard of the health, vnto the person of a king, exhorting to lay violent hands vpon him.

King Agis, his mother, & grandmother, all three strangled.

The enemies did not willingly kill a king of Lacedæmon.

A slue king Theopompus: howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS sayde; that he was but hurt, not slayne. But heretofore there are diuers opinions: but it is certain that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores euer put to death: for that he had layd a plat of a noble deuise, and worthy of SPARTA, being of that age when men doe easily pardon them that offend: and was rather to be accused of his friends and enemies, because he had saued Leonidas life, & had trusted other men, as the best natured younge man that could be.

Now Agis hauing suffered in this sort, Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamus his brother also, for he fled presently. Yet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with a little boy she had by him, and married her vnto his sonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to marry: fearing least this younge Lady should be bestowed els where, being in deede a great heire, and of a riche house, and the Daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agistis, besides that she was the fayrest woman at that tyme in all GRÆCE, and the vertuouslest and best conditioned. Wherefore, for diuers respects she praied he might not be forced to it. But now being at length married vnto Cleomenes, she euer hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: Who immediately after he was married vnto her, fell greatly in fancy with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the loue she bare vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembrance she had of him: inso much as he him selfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquisiuite how things had passed, taking great pleasure to heare of Agis wife counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as desirous of honor, and had as noble a minde as Agis, and was borne also to temperancie and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modestie and lenitie which the other had, but was somewhat more stirring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it greate honestie to bringe the Citizens if he could, to be contented to liue after an honest sorte: but contrarily, he thought it no dishonestie to bringe them vnto good life, by compulsion also. Furthermore, the manners of the Citizens of SPARTA, giuing them selues ouer to idleness and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did suffer the common wealth to be ruled as they listed, so no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: inso much no man regarding the profit of the common wealth, euery man was for him selfe, and his familie. And contrarily, it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperancie, and for the restoring againe of equality of life, the preferment whereof was the only cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Cleomenes being a young stripling, had heard some disputation of Philosphie, when the Philosopher Spharus, of the contrie of BORYSTHENES came to LACEDÆMON, and louingly stayed there to teache younge men and children. He was one of the chiefeest schollers of Zenon CITTIAN, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble minde, and had a great desire to pricke him forward vnto honor. For, as it is reported, that the auncient Leonidas being demanded what Poet he thought Tyrans to be, answered he was good to flatter younge mens myndes: for he sette their hartes a fire by his verses, when they beggan to fight any battell, fearing no daunger, they were so incouraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat daungerous, for the stowte and valiant myndes, which otherwise doth make them desperate: but when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lyftech vp his hart, and then maketh him taste the profit thereof. Nowe Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) being deceased, and he him selfe comen vnto the crowne, finding that the Citizens of SPARTA at that tyme were very dissolute, that the riche men followed their pleasure and profit taking no care of the common weale, that the poore men also for very want and neede went with no good life and courage to the warres, nether cared for the bringing vp of their children, and that he him selfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authoritie to doe what they listed: at his first comming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and gouernment of the common wealth. Who hauing a friend called Xenares, that had bene his louer in his youth (which the LACEDÆMONIANS called Emphnistæ, as much as inspired) he beggan to sownd his opinion, asking what manner of man king Agis had bene, and by what reason, and whose aduise he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the common wealth. Xenares at the first did not willingly reheare these things vnto him, declaring euery thing what had passed. But when he found that A Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, & still desired to heare of it: then Xenares sharply and angrily reprov'd him, and tolde him he was not wise, nor well aduised, and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont, yet making no man priuie why he absteined from comming to him; but tolde them that asked him, he knew a cause well enough why. Xenares now having thus refused him, and thinking all the rest would doe the like to bringe this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with him selfe. Because he thought he might rather doe it in warre, then in peace, he set the citie of SPARTA and the ACHAÏANS at variance together: who did them selues giue the first occasion to be complayned vpon. For Aratus being President and chiefe of all the ACHAÏANS, had practised a long tyme to bringe all PELOPONNESVS into one bodye: and had therefore onely susteyned great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other waye to deliuer them from forreyne warres. Nowe when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion: there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACEDÆMONIANS, and a few of the ARCADIANs, which were subiect vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. When king Leonidas was deade, Aratus beganne to invade the ARCADIANs, those specially that bordered upon the ARGOÏES: to proue how the LACEDÆMONIANS would take it, making no accompt of Cleomenes, being but a young king, & had no experience of warres. Thereupon the Ephori sent Cleomenes vnto ATHENIUM (a temple of Minerva hard by the citie of BELBINA) with an armie to take in because it was a passage & entry into the CONTRY of LACONIA, howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALOPOLITANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS. Cleomenes got it, and fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwife of the matter, stalle out one night with his army to set upon the TARGEANS, and ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to haue taken those cities by treason. But the traitors that were of his confederacy, their hearts failed them when they should haue gonne about it: so that Aratus returned, hauing lost his iorney, thinking that this secret attempt of his was not discouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend, and asked him, whether he had led his armie by night: Aratus returned answer againe, that vnderstanding Cleomenes ment to fortifie BELBINA, he went forth with his armie, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him, and said he did beleuee that which he spake was true: howbeit he earnestly requested him, (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertise him why he brought schaling ladders and lightes after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked what this young man was. Democritus LACEDÆMONIAN being a banished man out of his cōtry, answered: if thou hast any thing to doe against the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou hadst neede make haste, before this young Cockerell haue on his spurs. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the contry of ARCADIA, with a few horsemen and three hundred footemen onely: the Ephori being afraid of warres, sent for him to returne againe. His backe was no sooner turned, obeying their commaundement: but Aratus sodainly tooke the citie of CAPHYRS. Thereupon, the Ephori incontinently sent Cleomenes backe again with his armie: who tooke the fort of Methydrum, and burnt the borders of the ARGOÏES. The ACHAÏANS came against him with an army of twenty thousand footemen, and a thousand horsemen, led by Aristomachus: Cleomenes met with them by the city of PALANTIVM, and offered battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardines of this young man, would not suffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way, derided by the ACHAÏANS, and despised by the LACEDÆMONIANS: who in all were not about five thousand fighting men. Cleomenes corage being now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens: he remembered them of a saying of one of their auncient kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS neuer inquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, the ACHAÏANS making warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to ayde them, & met with the armie of the ACHAÏANS by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne: he setting upon them, gaue them the ouerthrowe, slue a great number of them, and tooke many also prisoners, that the rumor ranne through GRECE, how Aratus selfe was slaine. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this victory gaue him: he went straight to the citie of MANTINEA, and taking it vpon a sodaine, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it. Agis, overwearying them with warres: he went about to sende for Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at MASSENA, vnto whom the kingdom of right belonged by the other house, supposing that he should easily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authoritie of the two kings, if both of them ioyned together. Which when the murderers of king Agis vnderstoode, being affraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them: they secretly receiued him into the citie, and founde the meanes to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was vnnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly testifieth) or else with his priuicie, suffring them to make him away, by persuasion of his friends. But it is a cleere case, the citie was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out that they had compelled Cleomenes to doe it. Neuerthelesse, he holding still his first determination, to alter the state of the common wealth of SPARTA, as soone as he could possible: he so fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he should make warre. He had also won many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Cratesilea, who furnisht him with money, that he lacked not to honor him withall: and further, married as it is reported, (being otherwise not ment to marry) for her sonnes sake, vnto one of the wealthiest men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wanne a place within the territorie of MEGALOPOLIS, called LEUCTRA. The ACHAÏANS also being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus: they straight fought a battell by the citie selfe, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his armie. Howbeit Aratus would not suffer the ACHAÏANS to follow them, because of bogges and quauemyres, but founded the retreat. But C Lyfidas a MEGALOPOLITAN being angrie withall, caused the horsemen he had about him to follow the chafe, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongst vines, walls, and ditches, where he was driuen to disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiving it, sent the light horsemen of the TARENTINS & CRETANS against him: of whom Lyfidas valiantly fighting was slaine. Then the LACEDÆMONIANS being courageous for this victorie, came with great cries, & geuing a fierce charge upon the ACHAÏANS, ouerthrew their whole armie, and slue a maruelous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take vp the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For Lyfidas corps, he caused it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe upon it, and a crowne on his head, sent it in this aray vnto the very gates of the city of MEGALOPOLIS. It was that selfe Lyfidas, who geuing D ouer the tyranny and gouernment of MEGALOPOLIS, made it a popular state, and free city, and ioyned it to the ACHAÏANS. After this victorie, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded him selfe that if he might once come to stablish the affaires of the common wealth at SPARTA to his mind, he might then easily overcome the ACHAÏANS: brake with his father in law Megistonus, and told him that it was necessary to take away the authoritie of the Ephores, and to make diuision of the landes among the SPARTANS, and then being brought to equalitie, to encourage them to recouer the Empire of GRECE againe vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, which their predecessors before them, held and enioyed. Megistonus granting his good will and furtherance, ioyned two or three of his frendes more vnto him. It chanced at that time that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Papipha, had a marue- E lous dreame in the night. For he thought he sawe but one chaire standing where the Ephori did vie to sit to geue audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away: and that maruelling at it, he heard a voyce out of the temple that said, that was the best for SPARTA. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, for that he had heard some inckling of his intent. But when he perswaded him selfe that the other ment good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose, and taking with him vnto the campe all those SPARTANS who he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and tooke the cities of HEREA and ALSRA, confederats of the ACHAÏANS, and vittelled ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the citie of MANTINEA. In fine, he so wearied F & ouerharried the LACEDÆMONIANS by long iorneyes, that at length they besought him he would let them remaine in ARCADIA, to repose them selues there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his straungers which he had hyred, returned againe vnto SPARTA, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he trusted best, and marched at his owne ease, that he might take the Ephores at supper. When he came neere vnto the city, he sent Euryclides before, into the halles of the Ephores, as though he brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he sent also Thericion & Phabius, and two other that had bene brought vp with him, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a fewe souldiers. Nowe whilst Euryclides was talking with the Ephores, they also came in upon them with their swordes drawn, and did set upon the Ephores. Agesslaus was hurt first of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene slaine, but by litle & litle he crept out of the halles, and got secretly into a chappell consecrated vnto Fear, the which was wont euer to be kept shut, but then by chance was left open, when he was come in, he shut the dore fast to him. The other foure of the Ephores were slaine presently, and aboue tenne moe besides, which came to defende them. Furthermore, for them that fate still and sturred not, they killed nota man of them, neither did keepe any man that was desirous to goe out of the citie: but moreouer, they pardoned Agesslaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Fear. Amongest the LACEDÆMONIANS in the citie of SPARTA, there are not onely temples of feare and death, but also of laughter, and of many other such passions of the minde. They do worshipspe Fear, not as other spirites and deuils that are hurtfull: but because they are perswaded, that nothing preferueth a common wealth better then feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Aristotle witnesseth) when they are created, doe by publicke proclamation commaunde all the SPARTANS to haue their chinnes, and to obey the law, least they should make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the shauing of their chinnes, in my opinion, to inure young men to obey the Magistrates euen in trifles. Moreouer it seemes that men in olde time did esteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare & lothnes to incurre shame. For commonly those that are most affrayed to offend the law, are in the field most valliant against their enemy: and shunne no perill to winne fame and honest reputacion. And therefore it was wisely sayd of one,

That feare can not be without shamefastnes.

And so Homer in a certaine place made Hellen say vnto king Priamus:

Of truth I doe confesse deere father in law,

You are the man of whom I stand in awe,

And reuerence most of all that ere I saw.

And in an other place, speaking of the GRÆCIAN souldiers, he sayth thus:

For feare of their Captaines they speake not a word.

For men do vse to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cause why the chappell of Fear was by the halles of the Ephores, hauing in maner a princely and absolute authoritie. The next morning Cleomenes banished by trompet, foure score citizens of SPARTA, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one only, the which he reserued for him selfe to sit in to geue audience. Then calling the people to counsell, he gaue them an account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had ioyned the Senators with the kings, & how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithstanding, afterwards the city hauing great warres with the MESSENIANS, the kings being alwaies employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the common wealth at home, did chooſe certaine of their frendes to sitte in iudgement in their steades, to determine controuersies of lawe: which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kings ministers, howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke upon them absolute gouernment by the selues. And for manifest proofe hereof, you see that at this present time when the Ephori do send for the king, the first and second time, they refuse to come, but the third time he riseth and goeth vnto them. The first man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Asteropus, one of the Ephores many yeares after the first institution of the kings: and yet if they had gouerned discretely, peraduenture they might haue continued longer. But they licentiouslly abusing their authoritie, by suppressing the lawfull Gouernors instituted of old time, taking upon them to banish some of their kings, and putting other of them also to death, without law and iustice, and threatning others that desire to restore that noble and former blessed gouern-

A gouernment vnto SPARTA againe: all these things I say, are in no wise to be suffered any longer. And therefore, if it had bene possible to haue banished all these plagues of the common wealth out of SPARTA, brought from forreine nations: (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, detts, and vnties, and others yet more auuncient, poverty and riches) he might then haue esteemed him selfe the happiest king that euer was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his contrie of that infection, without griefe or sorrow. But in that he was constrained to beginne with blood, he followed Lycurgus example: who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but a priuate citizen only, taking upon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilam that then reigned, so affrayed, that he was driuen to take sanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a noble nature, and louing the honor of his contrie: tooke parte with Lycurgus, adding to his aduise and counsell, for the alteration of the state of the gouernment of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus saw it was a hard thing to alter the common wealth without force and feare: the which he notwithstanding had vied with as great modestie and discretion, as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profit and wealth of LACEDÆMON, geuing all the lands of the contrie also to be equally deuided amongst them, and setting all men cleere that were in dette. And furthermore, that he would make a choise and proofe of the strangers, to make them free citizens of SPARTA, whom he knew to be honest men, thereby to defende their citie the better by force of armes: to tend that from henceforth we may no more see our contrie of LACONIA spoiled by the ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defende them selues against them. Then he beganne first him selfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megistomus his father in law, and consequently all his other frendes. Then he caused the lands also to be deuided, and ordeined euery banished man a part, whom he him selfe had exiled, promising that he would receiue them againe into the city, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choicest honest men their neighbours: he made foure thousand footemen well armed, and taught them to vse their pykes with both handes, in steade of their darts with one hande, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he tooke order for the education of children; and to restore the auncient LACONIAN discipline againe: and did all these things in maner by the helpe of Sphermus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickly set vp againe schoole hooses for children, and also brought them to the old order of dyer: and all but a very fewe, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institution of life. Then because the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Euelidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one house but then. Furthermore, vnderstanding that the ACHAÏANS and ARATIS were of opinion, that he durst not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leaue it in perill of reuolting, because of the late chaunge and alteration in the common wealth: he thought it an honorable attempt of him, to make his enemies see the readines and good will of his armie. Thereupon he invaded the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and brought away a great praye and booty, after he had done great hurt vnto his enemies. Then hauing taken certaine players and minstrells that came from MASSINA, he sette vp a stage within the enemies contrie, made a game of 40. Minos for the victor, and fate a whole day to looke upon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the sight of it, but more to despise the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they, to make such a Mayegame in their owne contrie, in despite of them. For of all the armies otherwise of the GRÆCIANS, or kings in all GRÆCE, there was no armie onely but his, that was without players, minstrells, foolles and iugglers: for his campe only was cleane of such rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to some exercise of their bodies, and the old men also to teache them. And if they chaunced to haue any vacant time, then they would pleasantly be one merie with an other, in geuing some pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. And what profit they got by that kinde of exercise, we haue written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of all these things, the king him selfe was their schoolemaister and example, shewing him selfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curiositie, no more then any priuate souldier of all his campe: the which were great helps vnto him in his enterprises he made in Greece. A For the Grecians hauing cause of fute and negociacion with other kings and Princes, did not wonder so much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhorre and detest their pride and infolencie: so disdainfully they would aunswere them that had to doe with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a king in name and deede as they were, finding no purple robes nor stately mantells, nor rich imbrodered beddes, nor a Prince to be spoken to but by messengers, gentlemen vthers, and supplications, and yet with great a doe: and seeing him also come plainly apparellled vnto them, with a good countenance, and curiously aunswere the matters they came for: he thereby did maruelously win their hearts and good wills, that when they returned home, they said he only was the worthy king, that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his dyet at his bord, that was very straight and LACONIAN like, keeping only three bords: and if he chanced to feast any Ambassadors or other his frendes that came to see him, he then added to two other bords, and besides, made his men to see that his fare should be amended, not with pastrie and conserues, but with more store of meate, and some better wyne then ordinarie. For he one day reproveth one of his frendes, that bidding straungers to supper, he gaue the nothing but blacke broth, & browne bread only, according to their LACONIAN maner. Nay, said he, we may not vse straungers so hardly after our maner. The bord being taken vp, an other little table was brought with three seete, whereupon they set a bolle of copper full of wyne, and two silver cuppes of a pottell a peece, and certaine other fewe silver pottes besides: so euery man dranke what they listed, and no man was forced to drinke more then he woulde. Furthermore, there was no sporte, nor any pleasaunt song, C sounge, to make the companie merie, for it needed not. For Cleomenes selfe would entertaine them with some pretie questions, or pleasaunt tale: whereby, as his talke was not seuered and without pleasure, so was it also pleasaunt without infolencie. For he was of opinion, that to winne men by gifts or money, as other kings and Princes did, was but base and cloyne like: but to seeke their good wills by courteous meanes, and pleasauntnes, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought most fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his minde, that there was no other difference betwix a frend and hyerling: but that the one is wonnie with money, and the other with ciuility & good entertainment. The first therefore that receiued king Cleomenes into their citie, were the MANTINIANS, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to driue out the garrison of the ACHAIA NS, they yielded them selues vnto him. D But he referring them to the vse and gouernment of their owne lawes and libertie, departed from thence the same day, and went vnto the citie of TEGEA. Shortly after, he compassed about ARCADIA, and came vnto PHERES in ARCADIA determining one of the two, either to geue the ACHAIA NS battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauor with the people, for that he had suffred him to spoyle and destroy their contrie. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the ACHAIA NS, but Aratus did beare all the sway and authoritie. Then the ACHAIA NS coming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citie of DYMES, neere vnto the temple of Hecatombeum: Cleomenes going thither, laye betwix the citie of DYMES that was against him, and the campe of his enemies, which men thought a verie vnwise parte of him. Howebeit valiantly prouoking the ACHAIA NS, he procured them to the battell, overthrew them, made them flee, and slue a great number in the field, and tooke many of them also prisoners. Departing from thence, he went and set upon the citie of LANGON, and draue the garrison of the ACHAIA NS out of it, and restored the citie againe vnto the ELIA NS. The ACHAIA NS being then in verie hard state, Aratus that of custome was wont to be their Generall, (or at the least once in two yeares) refused now to take the charge, notwithstanding the ACHAIA NS did specially pray and intreate him: the which was an ill act of him, to let an other steere the rudder, in so daungerous a storme and tempest. Therefore the ACHAIA NS sent Ambassadors vnto Cleomenes to treatte peace, vnto whome it seemed he gaue a verie sharpe aunswere. After that, he sent vnto them, and willed them only to resigne the signorie of Greece vnto him: and that for all other matters he would deale reasonably with them, and presently F deliuer them vp their townes & prisoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The ACHAIA NS being glad of peace with these condicions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he shoulde come

A vnto the citie of LERNA, where the dyet and generall assemblie shoulde be kept to consult thereupon. It chaunced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hotte, dranke cold water, and fell of suche a bleeding withall, that his voyce was taken from him, and he almost stifled. Wherefore he sent the ACHAIA NS their chiefe prisoners home againe, proroging the parliament till an other time, and returned backe to LACEDÆMON. It is supposed certainly, that this let of his comming to the dyet, was the onely cause of the vter destruction of Greece: the which otherwise was in good way to haue risen againe, and to haue bene deliuered from the present miseries, and extreme pride and couetousnes of the MACEDONIA NS. For Aratus, either for that he trusted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affrayed of his power, or that he otherwise enuied his honor & prosperitie, to see him risen to such incredible greatness in so short a time, and thinking it also too great shame and dishonor to him, to suffer this young man in a moment to deprive him of his great honor & power which he had possessed so long time, by the space of thirtie yeares together, ruling all Greece: first, he sought by force to terrifie the ACHAIA NS, and to make them breake of from this peate. But in fine, finding that they little regarded his threats, & that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affrayed of Cleomenes valliantnesse and corage, whose request they thought reasonable, for that he sought but to restore PELOPONNESVS into her former auncient estate againe: he fell then into a practise farre vnhoonest for a Grecian, verie infamous for him selfe, but most dishonorable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigonus into Greece, Antigonus in his youth had driuen thence, had taken from them the castell of CORINTHE, and had alwayes bene anemie of the kinges (but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had spoken all the ill he coule, as appeareth in his wrytings, saying that he tooke maruelous paines, and did put him selfe into many daungers, to deliuer the city of ATHENS from the garrison of the MACEDONIA NS) and yet notwithstanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his contrie only, but into his owne house, yea euen into the Ladies chambers & closets: disdainng that the king of LACEDÆMON, dissendng of the blood royall of Hercules (who setting vp againe the auncient maner of life of his contrie, did temper it as an instrument of musick out of tune, and brought it to the good, auncient and sober discipline and DORICAN life instituted by Lycurgus) should be called and wrytten, king of the SICYONIA NS: and of the D TRIGIA NS. And furthermore, slyng them that were contented with browne bread, and with the plaine course capes of the LACEDÆMONIA NS, and that went about to take awaye riches (which was the chiefe matter they did accuse Cleomenes for) and to provide for the poore: he went and put him selfe and all ACHAIA vnto the crowne and diademe, the purple robe, and prowde imperious commaundementes of the MACEDONIA NS, fearing least men should thinke that Cleomenes coulede commaunde him. Furthermore his follie was such, that hauing garlands of flowers on his head, he did sacrifice vnto Antigonus, & sing songs in praise of his honor, as if he had bene a god, where he was but a rotten man, consumed away. This that we haue written of Aratus (who was indueed with many noble vertues, & a worthy GRECIAN) is not so much to accuse him, as to make vs see the frailty and weakenes of mans nature: the which, though it haue neuer so excellent vertues, can not yet bring forth such perfit fruite, but that it hath euer some mayme and blemishe. Now, when the ACHAIA NS were met againe in the citie of ARGOS, to hold the session of their parliament before proroged, and Cleomenes also being come from TEGEA, to be at that parliament: euery man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before of the chiefe articles of the capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by fayre words or force would bring the people to graunt that he desired: sent to let him vnderstand, that he shoulde but come him selfe alone into the citie, and for safetie of his person, they woulde geue him three hundred offagers: or otherwise, if he woulde not leaue his armie, that then they woulde geue him audience without the citie, in the place of exercises, called Cylarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their aunswere, he told them that they had done him wrong: for they shoulde haue aduertised him of it before he had taken his iorney, and not now when he was almost hard at their gates, to sende him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereupon he wrote a letter vnto the counsell of the ACHAÏANS, altogether full of complaints against Aratus. On thother side also, Aratus in A his oration to the counsell, inueyed with bitter wordes against Cleomenes. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with speede, sent a Herald to proclaime warres against the ACHAÏANS, not in the city of ARGOS, but in the city of ÆGION, as Aratus wryteth, meaning to set aron them being vnprovided. Hereupon all ACHAÏA was in an vpror: for diuers cities did presently reuolt against the ACHAÏANS, because the common people hoped after the diuision of lands, and the discharging of their dettes. The noble men also in many places were offended with Aratus, because he practised to bring the MACEDONIANS into the contrie of PELOPONNESVS. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all these respects, brought his armie into ACHAÏA, and at his first comming tooke the citie of PALLENA, and draue out the garrison of the ACHAÏANS: and after that, wanne also the cities of PHENEVM, and PANTELIVM. Now the ACHAÏANS fearing some treason in CORINTH and SYCIONE, sent certaine horsemen out of the citie of ARGOS, to keepe those cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the feast at the games Nemea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to ARGOS, he should finde the citie full of people that were come to see the feastes and games, and that assailing them vpon the sodaine, he should put them in a maruelous feare brought his armie in the night hard to the walls of the citie of ARGOS, and at his first comming wanne a place they call Aspis, a verie strong place about the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The ARGIVES were so amazed at it, that no man would take upon him to defende the citie, but receiued Cleomenes garrison, and gaue him twentie ostages, promising thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnder his charge and conduct. The C which doubtles wanne him great fame, and increased his power: for that the auncient kings of LACEDÆMON, could neuer before with any policie or deuise, winne the citie of ARGOS. For king Pyrrius one of the most valliantest and warlikest Prince that euer was, entring the citie of ARGOS by force, could not keepe it, but was slaine there; and the most parte of his armie: wherby, euery man wondred greatly at the diligence & counsell of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes sayd that he would follow Solon, and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and discharging all detts: they were then clerely perswaded that he onely was the cause and meane of that great change, which they sawe in the corage of the SPARTANS: who were before so weake and out of hart, that they hauing no corage to defend them selues, the ÆTOLIANS entring LACONIA, with an armie, tooke away D at one time, fiftie thousand slaues. Whereupon an old man of SPARTA pleasauntly sayd at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleasure, to ridde their contrie of LACONIA of such a rabble of rascalls. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former auncient discipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus selfe had bene aliue to haue trained them vnto it: they shewed them selues verie valliant, and obedient also vnto their Magistrates, whereby they recovered againe the commaundement of all GRECE, and the contrie also of PELOPONNESVS. After Cleomenes had taken the citie of ARGOS, the cities also of CLEONES, and PHLYNTA, did yeelde them selues vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remayned at CORINTH, & there did busily accuse them which were suspected to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS. But when newes was brought him that ARGOS was taken, & that he perceived also the E citie of CORINTH did leane vnto Cleomenes parte, and draue away the ACHAÏANS: he then calling the people to counsell in CORINTH, secretly stole to one of the gates of the citie, and causing his horse to be brought vnto him, tooke his backe, and galloped for life vnto the citie of SYCIONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they tooke their horsebackes also, striking who should be there soonest, and posted in such a hast vnto Cleomenes at the citie of ARGOS, that many of them (as Aratus wryteth) killed their horses by the way: howbeit Cleomenes was verie much offended with them, for that they had let him scape their hands. But Aratus sayth further, that Megisthenes came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great summe of money to deliuer him the castell of CORINTH, wherein there was a great garrison of the ACHAÏANS. But he answered againe, that thinges were not in his power, but rather that he was subiect to their power. Now Cleomenes departing from the city of ARGOS, ouercame the TROEZONIANS, the EPIDAVRIANS, & the HARMONIANS. After that, he came

A vnto CORINTH, and presentlie entrenched the castell there rounde about, and sendinge for Aratus frendes and factors, commaunded them to keepe his house and goodes carefullie for him, and sent Tritymallus MESSENIAN againe vnto him, to praye him to be contented that the castell might be kept indifferentlie betwixt the ACHAÏANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, promising him priuately to double the pension that kinge Prology gaue him. But Aratus refusing it, sent his sonne vnto Antigonus with other ostages, and perswaded the ACHAÏANS to deliuer vnto the castell of CORINTH, vnto Antigonus handes. Cleomenes vnderstandinge it, entred with his armie into the contrie of the SYCIONIANS, and destroyed it as he went, and tooke Aratus goodes and money, of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by decree. Nowe Antigonus in the meane tyme, beinge passed the mountayne of Gerania with a greate power: Cleomenes determined not to forsue the Isthmus or straight of PELOPONNESVS, but the wayes of the mountaynes Onienes, determininge to keepe euerie one of them against the MACEDONIANS, with intent to consume them rather by tyme, then to fight a battell with an armie, so good souldiers and well trayned as they were. Cleomenes followinge this determination, did putte Antigonus to greate trouble, because he had not in time provided for corne: and could not winne the passage also by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with such garde and souldiers. Then Antigonus stealinge secretly into the haue of Lechaum, he was slowly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereupon Cleomenes and his men beinge courageous for this victorie, went quietly to supper. Antigonus on thother side fell into dispaire, to see him C selfe brought by necessitie into such harde termes. Wherefore he determined to goe to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to passe his armie by sea into the citie of SYCIONE, the which required a longe tyme, and greate preparation. But the same night there came some of Aratus frendes of the ARGIVES, who comming from ARGOS by sea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practiser of this rebellion, was one Aristoteles, who easilie brought the people vnto it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promised to passe a lawe for the clearing of dettes; but performed it not accordinge to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thousande five hundred men which Antigonus gaue him, went by sea vnto EPIDAVRUM. Howbeit Aristoteles taried not his comming, but takinge them of the citie with him, went and besieged the garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the castell, beinge ayded by Timotheus, with the ACHAÏANS that came from SYCIONE. Cleomenes receiuinge aduertisement hereof, about the seconde watche of the night, sent for Megisthenes in haste, and commaunded him in anger speedilie to goe and ayde their men that were in the citie of ARGOS. For it was Megisthenes him selfe that promised Cleomenes the fidelitie of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driuinge them out of the citie, which he suspected. So sendinge him away forthwith with two thousande men, he attended Antigonus; and comforted the CORINTHIANS the best he coule: aduertisinge them that it was but a litle mutinie of a fewe, that chaunced in the citie of ARGOS. Megisthenes beinge come to ARGOS, and slayne in battell, fightinge for the LACEDÆMONIANS in garrison there (who be E inge in greate distresse, scant able to keepe the castell against the enemies) sent fundrie messengers vnto Cleomenes, to praye him to sende them immediate ayde. Cleomenes then beinge affrayed that the enemies hauinge taken ARGOS, would stoppe his way to returne backe into his contrie, who hauinge opportunitee safelie to spoyle LACONIA, and also to besiege the citie selfe of SPARTA, that had but a fewe men to defende it: he departed with his armie from CORINTH. Immediately after came Antigonus, and tooke it from him, and put a stronge garrison into it. When Cleomenes came before the citie of ARGOS, he scaled the walles, and breakinge the vawtes and arches of the place called Aspis, immediatly to the citie, and ioyned with his garrison there; which yet resisted the ACHAÏANS: and takinge other partes of the same also, assaulted the walles, and cleared the streets in such F force, that not an enemy durst be seene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he sawe Antigonus a farre of, comming downe the hillside into the valley with his footemen; and that his horsemen also came upon the spur into the citie:

dispayringe then that he coule any longer keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and a safelie goinge downe by the walles reuyred without losse of any man. So, when in thosse tyme he had conquered muche, and had almost wonne all within PELOPONNESVS: in shorter space also, he lost all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his came, some did presentlie forsake him: others also immediately after surrendered vnto the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes beinge thus oppressed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the rest of his armie, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieved him as muche as the losse of all his conquests: for he was aduertised of the death of his wife Agistis, whome he loued so dearelie, that in the midst of his chiefest prosperitie and victories, he made often iourneys to SPARTA to see her. It coule not bur be a maruelous grieve vnto Cleomenes, who beinge a younge man, had losse so vertuous and fayer a younge Ladie, so dearelie beloued of him: and yet he gaue not place vnto his sorowe, neither did grieve overcome his noble courage, but he vsed the selfe same voyce, apparell, and countenance, that he did before. Then taking order with his priuate Capitaines, about his affayres, and hauinge provided also for the safetie of the TEGEANS: he went the next morninge by breake of daye vnto SPARTA. After he had priuately lamented the sorowe of his wiues death, with his mother and children: he presentlie bent his minde againe to publike causes. Nowe Cleomenes had sent vnto Ptolomy kinge of ÆGYPT, who had promised him ayde, but upon demaunde, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a longe tyme before he woulde for shame make his mother priuie vnto it, and went oftentimes of purpose to lette her vnderstande it: but when he came, he had not the harte to breake it to her. She first suspectinge a thinge, asked Cleomenes frendes, if her sonne had not somewhat to saye vnto her, that he durst not vtter. Whereupon, in fine he gaue the venter, and brake the matter to her. When she hearde it, she fell a laughinge, and tolde him: why, howe commeth it to passe, that thou hast kept it thus long, and wouldest not tell me? Come, come, sayed she, put me straight into a shippe, and sende me whither thou wilt, that this bodie of myne may doe some good vnto my contrie, before crooked age consume my life without profite. Then all thinges beinge prepared for their iorney, they went by lande, accompanied with the armie, vnto the heade of Tanarus. Where Cratesicles beinge readie to imbarke, she tooke Cleomenes aside into the temple of Neptune, and imbracinge and kissinge him, perceiuinge that his harte yerned for sorowe of her departure, D she sayed vnto him: O kinge of LACEDÆMON, lette no man see for shame when we come out of the temple, that we haue wept and dishonored SPARTA. For that onely is in our power, and for the rest, as it pleaseth the goddess, so lette it be. When she had spoken these wordes, and facioned her countenance againe: she went then to take her shippe, with a litle sonne of Cleomenes, and commaunded the maister of the shippe to hoysse sayle. Nowe when she was arrived in ÆGYPT, and vnderstoode that kinge Ptolomy receiued Ambassadors from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearinge also that Cleomenes beinge requested by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and ender that warre, without king *Ptolomy*s consent, and because of his mother: she wrote vnto him; that he shoulde not spare to doe any thinge that shoulde be expedient for the honour of SPARTA, without feare of displeasing Ptolomy, or for regarde of an olde woman, and a younge boye. Suche was the noble minde of this worthie Ladie in her sonne Cleomenes aduersitie. Furthermore, Antigonus hauing taken the cite of TEGEA, and sacked the other cities of ORCHOMENVM, and MANTINEA: Cleomenes seeinge him selfe brought to defende the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumise all the ILOTES, (which were the slaues of LACEDÆMON) payinge fise Attica Minas a man. With that money he made the summe of fise hundred talentes, and armed two thousande of these freed slaues after the MACEDONIAN facion to fight against the LEVCAPIDES: (to witte, the white shieldes of Antigonus) and then there sell into his minde a maruelous greate enterprife, vnto looked for of euery man. The cite of MEGALIPOLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, & E hauing the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIANS as it seemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALOPOLITANS.) Cleomenes determininge

A to sacke this cite, and knowing that to bring it to passe, nothing was more requisite then celeritie: he commaunded his souldiers to vittell them selues for fise dayes, and marching with the choyce of all his armie towards SELASTIA, as though he had ment to haue spoyled the ARGIVES, sodainly turning from thence, he inuaded the contrie of the MEGALOPOLITANS, and supping by ROBTVM, went straight by ELICVNTA vnto the cite. When he was come neere vnto it, he sent Panteas before with speede, with two bandes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded him to take a certeine peece of the wall betweene two towers, which he knewe was not kept nor garded: and he followed him also with the rest of his armie coming on fayer and softly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wall without gard or watche which Cleomenes had told him of, but also the most parte of that B side without defence: he tooke some parte of the wall at his first comming, and manned it, and ouerthrew an other peece of it also, putting them all to the sword that did defend it, and then came Cleomenes, and was within the cite with his armie, before the MEGALOPOLITANS knewe of his comming. At length, the citizens vnderstanding that the cite was taken, some fled in hast, conueying suche light things as came to hande, in so grear a feare: and the others also arming them selues, ranne together to resist the enemies. But though they valiantly fought to repulse them out of the cite, and yet preuayled not: they gaue the rest leasure thereby to fye and saue them selues, so that there remayned not behinde, aboue a thousande men. For all the rest were fled with their wiues and children, into the cite of MESSENNA. The most parte of them also that fought with the enemies, saued them selues, and verie C fewe were taken, the chiefest whereof, were Lyfandridas, and Thearidas, the noblest persons that were amongst the MEGALOPOLITANS: wherefore when the souldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lyfandridas, when he saw Cleomenes a good way off, cried out alowde vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, this day thou hast an occasion offered thee to doe a more famous princely acte, then that which thou hast alreadye done, and that will make thy name also more glorious. Cleomenes musing what he woulde request: well (q he) what is that thou requirest? One thing I will tell thee before hande, thou shalt not make me restore your cite to you againe. Yet, q Lyfandridas, lette me request thus muche then, that ye doe not destroy it, but rather replenishe it with frendes and confederates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you doe, geuing the MEGALOPOLITANS D their cite againe, and preservinge suche a number of people as haue forsaken it. Cleomenes pawing a while, answered, it was a hard thing to beleue that: but yet q he, let honor take place with vs, before profit. After that he sent a Heralde straight vnto MESSENNA vnto them that were fledde thither, and tolde them that he was contented to offer them their cite againe, so that they would become good frendes and confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, forsaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopamen would by no means suffer the MEGALOPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leaue their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he ment not to geue them their cite againe, but to take them also with their cite: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lyfandridas out of MESSENNA, that moued this practise. It was that Philopamen that afterwards was the chiefest man of E the ACHAIANS, and that wanne suche fame and honor among the GRECIANS, as we haue particularly declared in his life. This word beinge brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from spoyling vntill that time: he was then so thorowly offended, that he gaue the goods in praye to the souldiers, sent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefest partes of the cite, and then returned home againe, being affrayed of Antigonus, and the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they sturred not, because of the parliament that was kept at that time in the cite of ÆGIVM, where Aratus being in the pulpit for orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayde: he answered them, MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and rased by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the soudainnes of this great losse, straight brake of their F Parliament and assemblie. But Antigonus thinking to ayde them, sent presently for all his garriions, who being long a comming, he willed them to stay where they were, and he him selfe taking a fewe souldiers with him, went vnto the cite of ARGOS. enterprife of Cleomenes, seemeth at the first sight a verie rash and desperate attempt: howebeit Polybius wryteth, that it was an attempt of great wisdom and policie. For Cleomenes vnderstanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garisons in diuers places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the citie of ARGOS, with a certeyne number of footmen that were strangers: he inuaded the contrie of the ARGIVES with his armie, persuading him selfe, that either Antigonus would for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he should put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which in deede came so to passe. The ARGIVES seeing their contrie spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a maruelous rage, and gathering together at Antigonus lodgings, they cryed out vnto him, either to goe into the field, and fight with the enemy: or else if he were affrayed, to resigne his office of General of GRECE, vnto others that were valiantier than him selfe. But Antigo-nus like a wife and excellent Captaine, thinkinge it a dishonour to him rashly to put him selfe in daunger, and his frendes also, though he were prouoked with many iniuries and opprobrious wordes: would not goe into the field, but stood constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes hauing brought his armie hard to the wallles of the citie of AR-GOS, and spoiled and destroyed the contrie rounde about: without lette or daunger he safely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes beinge aduertised that Ant-igonus was come vnto TEBEA, with intent to inuade the contrie of LACONIA: he goinge an other way with his armie, (vnto which to his enemies) they wondered when they saw him in the morning by the citie of ARGOS, spoilinge their contrie, and cuttinge downe their come, not with sickles and knyues as other doe vfe, but with long poles in forme of Sythes, that the souldiers as they went sportinge, did ouerthrowe and spoyle it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbs, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the souldiers goinge about to haue sette it afire, Cleomenes would not suffer them, and tolde them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestlye done. Now Antigonus, presentlye returninge backe againe, beinge minded first to haue gone directly to the citie of ARGOS, but sodainly alteringe his minde, did campe vpon the toppes of hilles and mountaynes. Cleomenes seeming not to be affrayed of him, sent Heraclides to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done sacrifice, he would departe his waye. Thus mockinge Antigonus, after he had sacrificed vnto the goddesse, vnder the temple that was shut vp, he sent his armie vnto PHLIVNTA, and hauinge driuen awaye the garison out of OLOGNTA, he came vnto the citie of ORCHOMENVM, hauing not onely encouraged his citizens, but gotten euen amongst the enemies them selues, a fame also to be a noble Captaine, and worthe to manage greate affaires. For euery man iudged him to be a skillfull souldier, and a valliant Captaine, that with the power of one onely citie, did mainteine warre against the kingdom of MACEDON, against all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so greate a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his owne contrie of LACONIA vnspoyled, but farre otherwise to hurte his enemies contries, and to take so many greate cities of theirs. But he that sayed first, that money was the sinewe of all thinges, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the warres. Demades the Orator sayed on a time, when the ATHENIANS commaunded certaine gallies should be put out of the arsenall into the sea, and presentlye rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked money: he that rules the prow, must first see before him. Meaning, munition and vittells must be prouided, before the shippes be sette out. And it is reported also, that the ancient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACEDEMONIANS at the beginninge of the warre of PELOPONNESVS required, that they might be sessed at a certeine rate, aun-swered: the charges of warre haue no certeyne tinte. For like as wrestlers that exercise their bodies continuallie in games, are better able to wrestle, and ouerthrowe them with tyme, that haue no strength, but onely arte and slight: euen so Kinge Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome did defraye the charge of this warre, did wea-rie and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, bicause he lacked money bothe to paye the strangers that serued him, and also to mayntayne his owne citizens. For otherwise, doubtlesse

A doubtlesse the time serued his turne well, bicause the troubles that fell upon Antigonus in his realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his absence did spoyle and destroye the realme of MACEDON, and speciallie the ILLYRIANS of the high contrie that came downe then with a greate armie: whereupon, the MACEDONI-ANS beinge spoyled and harried on all sides by them, they sent poste vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these letters had bene brought him but a litle before the battell, as they came afterwarde: Antigonus had gone his waye, and left the ACHAIANS. But fortune, that alwayes striketh the stroke in all weightiest causes, gaue such speede and fauour vnto time: that immediately after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes lost his armie and citie) the verie messengers arriued that came for Antigonus to come home, the which made the ouerthrowe of king Cleomenes so muche more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two dayes longer, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might haue made what peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of money, he was driuen (as Polybius wryteth) to geue battell, with twentie thousande men, against thirtie thousande: where he shewed him selfe an excellent and skillfull Capitaine, and where his citizens also fought like valliant men, and the strangers in like case did shewe them selues good souldiers. But his onely ouerthrowe was, by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus wryteth, that treason was the cause of his ouerthrowe. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS which he had in his armie, to scale vpon the winge of his enemies armie, where Euclidas, king Cleomenes brother was, to compassse him in behinde, whilst he did sette the rest of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vpon some hill to looke about him, to see the countenance of the enemy, and seeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS: he was then affrayed of Antigonus, that he went about some stratageme of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heede of stratagemes and secret am-bushes, and commaunded him to looke to the reuerwarde of his armie, and to be verie cir-cumpect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, tolde him that all was cleere in the reuerwarde, and bad him looke to ouerthrowe his enemies before him. Cleomenes trusting this reporte, sette forward against Antigonus, and in the ende, his citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gaue such a ferce charge upon the squadron of the MACEDONIAN footemen, that they draue them backe fife furlonges of. But in the meane time, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his armie, beinge compassed in behinde, Cleomenes turning him backe, and seeing the ouerthrowe, cried out alowde: alas, good brother, thou art but slaine, yet thou dyest valliantlie, and honestlye, and thy death shall be a worthie example vnto all posteritie, and shall be song by the praifes of the women of SPARTA. So Euclidas and his men beinge slaine, the enemies came straight to sette vpon Cleomenes winge. Cleomenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer resist the enemy, fledde, and saued him selfe. Many of the strangers also that serued him, were slaine at this battell: and of fixe thousande SPARTANS, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes beinge returned vnto SPARTA, the citizens comming to see him, he gaue them counsell to yeeld them selues vnto Antigonus the conqueror: and for him selfe, either aliue or dead he could doe any thing for the honor and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly doe it. The women of the citie also, comming vnto them that flying had escaped with him, when he saw then vnarme the men, and bring them drinke to refresh them with: he also went home to his owne house. Then a maide of the house, which he had taken in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertained euer since the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refresh him comming hot from the battell: howbeit he would not drinke though he was extreame drie, nor fit beinge verie wearie, but armed as he was, layed his arme a crosse upon a pillar, and leaning his head upon it, reposed him selfe a litle, and casting in his minde all the wayes that were to be thought of, he tooke his frendes with him, and went to the haue of Gythium, and there hauing his shippes which he had appointed for the purpose, he hoysed sayle, and departed his way. Immediately after his depature, came Antigonus into the citie of SPARTA, and curiously intreated the citizens and inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly despise the auncient honor and dignitie of SPARTA: but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernment, when he had sacrificed to the goddess for his victorie, he departed from thence the third daye, newes being brought him that the warre was verie great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did spoyle his contrie. Now a discale tooke him, whereof he dyed afterwards, which appeared a tickle, mixt with a fore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his discale, and bare it out, that fighting for his contrie, and obteyning a famous victorie, with great slaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably, as in deede he did, by Phylarchus testimonie, who sayth, that with the force of his voyce, fiercely crying out in the midst of his fight, he tare his lunges and lightes, worse then they were before. Yet in the schooles it is sayd, that after he had wonne the battell, he was so ioyfull of it, that crying out, O blessed day: he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great feuer tooke him withall, that he dyed of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Ile of CYTHERA, went and cast anchor in an other Iland, called ÆGIALIA. Then determining to saile ouer to the citie of CYRENA, Thercion, one of Cleomenes frendes (a man that in warres shewed him selfe verie valliant, but a boaster besides of his owne doings) tooke Cleomenes aside, and sayd thus vnto him: Truly O king, we haue lost an honorable occasion to dye in battell, though euery man hath heard vs vaunt and say, that Antigonus should neuer overcome the king of SPARTA alieue, but dead. A seconde occasion yet is offered vs to dye, with much lesse honor and fame notwithstanding, then the first. Whether doe we saile to no purpose? Why doe we flie the death at hand, and seeke it so farre off? If it be no shame nor dishonor for the posteritie & race of Hercules to serue the successors of Philip and Alexander: let vs saue then our labor, and long dangerous sailing, and goe yeelde our selues vnto Antigonus, who in likelyhoode will better vse vs then Ptolomy, because the MACEDONIANS are farre more nobler persons then the EGYPTIANS. And if we disdain to be commaunded by them which haue ouercommen vs in battell, why then will we make him Lord of vs, that hath not ouercommen vs: in steade of one, to make vs inferior vnto both, flying Antigonus, and seruing king Ptolomy? Can we say that we goe into EGYPT, in respect to see your mother there? A ioyfull sight no doubt, when she shall thinke king Ptolomy wiues her sonne, that before was a king, a prisoner, & fugitive now. Were it not better for vs, that hauing yet LACONIA our contrie in fight, and our swordes besides in our owne hands, to deliuer vs from this great miserie, & so doing to excuse our selues vnto them that are slaine at SELASTIA, for defence of SPARTA: then cowardly loosing our time in EGYPT, to inquire whom Antigonus left his Lieutenant and Gouernor in LACEDÆMON? Thercion ending his oration, Cleomenes answered him thus: Dost thou thinke it a glorie for thee to seeke death, which is the easiest matter, and the presentest vnto any man, that can be and yet, wretche that thou art: thou fliest now more cowardly and shamefully, then from the battell. For diuers valliant men, and farre better then our selues, haue often yeelded vnto their enemies, either by some misfortune, or compelled by greater number and multitude of men: but he say I, that submitteth him selfe vnto paine and miserie, reproache and praise of men, he can not but confesse that he is overcome by his owne unhappinesse. For, when a man will willingly kill him selfe, he must not doe it to be rid of paynes and labour, but it must haue an honorable respect and action. For, to liue or dye for his owne respect, that can not but be dishonorable: the which now thou perswadest me vnto, to make me flie this present miserie we are in, without any honor or profite in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we shoulde not yet cast of the hope we haue to serue our contrie in time to come: but when all hope fayleth vs, then we may safely make our selues awaye when we list. Therunto Thercion gaue no answer, but as soone as he founde oportunitie to slippe from Cleomenes, he went to the sea side, and slewe him selfe. Cleomenes hoysing sayle from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICK, and was brought by the kinges seruantes vnto the citie of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his first comming, gaue Cleomenes no speciall good, but indifferent intertainment: but after that he had shewed him selfe to be of great wisdom and iudgement, and that Ptolomy saw in the simplicity of his LACONIAN life he had also a noble disposition and corage, nothing degenerating from the princely race & blood of Hercules, and

A and that he yeelded not to his aduersitie: he tooke more delight in his company, then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly, that he had made no more account of him before, but had suffered him to be ouerthrowne by Antigonus, who through the victory of him, had maruelously enlarged his honor and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promised that he would send him with shippes and money into GRECE, and put him againe into his kingdom: & further, gaue him an annuall pencion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talents, with the which he simply and soberly enterreynd him selfe and his men about him: and bestowed all the rest apön his contry men that came out of GRECE into EGYPT. But now, old king Ptolomy deceaſing before he could performe the promise he made vnto Cleomenes, to send him into GRECE: the Realme falling then into great lasciuiousnes, dronckennes, and into the gouernment of women, his case and miserie was cleane forgotten. For the young king his sonne was so giuen ouer to women and wine, that when he was most sober, and in his best witts, he most disposed him selfe to make feastes and sacrifices, and to haue the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a stage player or iugler, whilst one Agathocles his lemman, and her mother, and Oenantes a bawde, did rule all the assayres of the state. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had neede of Cleomenes: bicause he was afraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers meanes, was very well esteemed of among souldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his priuy counsel, where he deuided by practise, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counsell with him, did counsell him to do it: but Cleomenes onely vehemently dissuaded him from it, and tolde him, that if it were possible, rather moe brethren should be begotten vnto the king for the safetie of his person, and for deuiding of the assayres of the kingdom betweene them. Amongst the kinges familiars that was chiefeest about him, there was one Sosibius that said vnto Cleomenes: so long as his brother Magas liued, the souldiers that be strangers, whom the king entertrayned, would neuer be true to him. Cleomenes answered him, for that matter there was no danger: for sayth he, of those hired strangers, there are three thousand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knewe at the twinkling of an eye, would be at his commaundement, to come with their armor & weapon where he would appoynt them. These words of Cleomenes at that tyme shewed his fayth and good will he bare vnto the king, and the force he was of besides. But afterwards, Ptolomyes D fearefulness increasing his mistrust: (as it commonly hapneth, that they that lacke wit, thinke it the best safetie to be fearefull of euery wagging of a strawe, and to mistrust euery man) the remembrance of Cleomenes wordes made him much suspected of the Courtiers, vnderstanding that he could doe so much with the souldiers that were strangers: in so much as some of them sayd, see (meaning Cleomenes) there is a lyon amongst sheepe. In deede, considering his facions and behauior, they might well say so of him: for he would looke thorough his fingers as though he saw nothing, and yet saw all what they did. In fine, he required an armie & shippes of the king: and vnderstanding also that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIIANS and ÆTOLIANS were at great warres together, and that the affaires of his contry did call him home, all PELOPONNESVS being in armes and vpror, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But neuer a man would giue eare vnto him, and the king also heard nothing of it, bicause he was continually entertained among Ladies, with banckets, dauncing, & masks. But Sosibius that ruled all the Realme, thought that to keepe Cleomenes against his wil, were a hard thing, and also dangerous: and to let him goe also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a stirring minde, and one that knew the vices and imperfections of their gouernment: he thought that also no safe way, sith no giftes nor presents that could be offered him, could soften him. For as the holy bull (which they call in EGYPT Apis) that is suffred in goodly pasture, doth yet desire to followe his naturall course and libertie, to runne and leape at his pleasure, and plainely sheweth that it is a griefto him to be kept still by the Priest: euen so the courtly pleasures did nothing delight Cleomenes; but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

It irks his noble hart to sit at home in slothfull rest, When martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked best.

Nowe Cleomenes standing in these tearmes, there arriued in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras

 Nicagoras on a time had sold Cleomenes certain land, but was not payed for it, either because he had no present money, or els by occasiō of the warres which gaue him no leasure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chaunce walking vpon the sandes, he sawe Nicagoras landing out of his shippe, being newly arriued, and knowing him, he curteously welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into EGYPT. Nicagoras gently saluting him againe, tolde him that he had brought the king excellent horse of seruice. Cleomenes smiling, tolde him, thou haddest bene better haue brought him some curifans & daunfers, for they would haue pleased the king better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his aunswer, but within few dayes after he did put him in remembrance of the land he sold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to money, telling him that he would not haue prest him for it, but that he had susteyned B losse by marchandise. Cleomenes aunswered him, that all his pension was spent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this aunswer, he went and told Sosibius of the mocke Cleo-menes gaue the king. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he perswaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king agaynst Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the cite of CYRENA, if the king had giuen him shippes, money, and men of warre. When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke shippe, and hoysed sayle. Foure dayes after his departure, Sosibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly receiued it. The king upon sight of it was so offended with Cleome-nes, that he gaue present order he should be shut vp in a great house, where he should haue his ordinary dyet allowed him, howbeit that he should keepe his house. This grieved Cleomenes C much, but yet he was worse affraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the sonne of Chryfermus, one of the kings familiers, who had oftentimes before bene very conuersant and familiar with Cleomenes, and did frankly talke together in all matters: Cleomenes one daye sent for him, to praye him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his request, and familiarly discoursing together, went about to disswade him from all the suspicions he had, and excused the king also for that he had done vnto him: so taking his leaue he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate, where he sharply tooke vp the souldiers, saying, that they were very negligent and careles in looking to such a fearefull beast as he was, & so ill to be taken, if he once escaped their handes. Cleomenes heard what he sayd, and went into his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very D wordes againe vnto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS conuicting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniurie Ptolomy had done them, and to dye like noble SPARTANS not tarying til they should be brought to the shambles like fat weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonor vnto Cleomenes, hauing refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and warrior: to tary the kinges pleasure till he had left his dronckenes and daunfing, and then to come and put him to death. They beeing fully resolved hereof, as you haue heard: king Ptolomy by chaunce went vnto the cite of CANOBYE, & first they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA, that the king minded to set Cleomenes at libertie. Then Cleomenes friends obseruing the custome of the kings of EGYPT, when they ment to set a prisoner at libertie (which was, to send the prisoners meate, and presents before to their supper) E did send vnto him such manner of presents, & so deceiued the souldiers that had the keeping of him, saying, that they brought those presents from the king. For Cleomenes him selfe did sacrifice vnto the goddess, and sent vnto the souldiers that kept him, parte of those presents that were sent vnto him, and supping with his friends that night, made mery with them, euery man being crowned with garlands. Some say, that he made the more haste to execute his enterprise, sooner then he would haue done, by means of one of his men that was priuie vnto his conspiracie: who went euery night to ly with a woman he kept, and therefore was affraid lest he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone, perceiuing the souldiers had take in their cuppes, and that they were a sleepe: he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his sword drawn in his hand, accompanied with his friends, F following him in that sort, which were thirty in all. Amongest them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very liuely out with them at the first: but when he saw they went fairer

A fairer and softly because of him, he prayed them to kil him, because they should not hinder their enterprise for a lame man, that could doe them no seruice. Notwithstanding, by chaunce they met with a townes man a horsebacke, that came hard by their dore, whome they pluckt from his horse, and cast Hippotas vpon him: and then ranne through the cite, and cryed to the people, libertie, libertie. Now the people had no other corage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondered at his valiantnes: but otherwise to follow him, or to further his enterprise, not a man of them had any hart in them. Thus running vp and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the same whome we sayde before was the ionne of Chryfermus) as he came out of the Court: Whereupon three of them setting on him, slue him presently. There was also another Ptolomy that was gouernor and Lieutenant of the cite of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumor of this sturre, came vnto them in his coche. They went and met him, and first hauing driuen away his garde and souldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coche, and slue him also. After that they went towards the castell, with intent to set all the prisoners there at libertie to take their part. Howbeit the gaylers that kept them had so strongly locked vp the prison dores, that Cleomenes was repulsd, and put by his purpose. Thus wand-ring vp and downe the cite, no man neither came to ioine with him, nor to ressit him, for e-uery man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going vp and downe, he turned him to his friends, and sayd vnto them: it is no maruell though women commaund such a cowardly people, that flye in this sort from their libertie. Thereupon he prayed them all to dye like men, and like those that were brought vp with him, and that were worthy of the same of his so noble dedes. Then the first man that made him selfe be slayne, was Hippotas, who dyed of a wound one of the young men of his company gaue him with a sword at his request. After him euery man slue them selues, one after another, without any feare at all, following Panteas, who was the first man that entred the cite of MEGALIPOLIS. He was a fairer young man, and had bene very well brought vp in the LACONIAN discipline, and better then any man of his yeares. Cleomenes did loue him dearly, and commaunded him that when he should fee he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill him selfe last of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he searched them one after another with the poynt of his sword, to see if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongst others, and saw that he dyed yet knit his browes, he kissed him, & laye downe D by him. Then perceiuing that he had yelded vp the ghost, embracing him when he was dead, he also slue him selfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Cleomenes hauing reigned king of SPARTA fix-teene yeares, being the same manner of man we haue described him to be: he ended his dayes in this sort as ye heare. Now, his death being presently bruted through the cite, Cratesicles his mother, though otherwise she had a noble minde, did notwithstanding a litle forget her great-nes, through the extreme sorow she felt for the death of her sonne: and so embracing Cleome-nes sonnes, she fell to bitter lamentacion. But the eldest of his sonnes, (no man mistrusting any such matter) found meanes to get out of her handes, & running vp to the toppes of the house, cast him selfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and splittred, yet died not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with them, that they would not suffer him to dye.
 E This newes being brought to king Ptolomy, he commaunded they should first slea Cleomenes, and then hange vp his body, and also, that they should put his children, his mother, and all her women wayting on her to death: among the which was Panteas wife, one of the fayrest and curteousest women in her tyme. They had not bene long married before, when these mischieues lighted upon them, at what tyme their loue was then in greatest force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit shortly after she found the meanes to get her a horse, & some money, and stole away in the night, and galloped towards the hauen of Tanarus, where finding a shippe ready bound for EGYPT, she imbarked, and went to seeke her husband, with whome she gladly and louingly ledde her life, forsaking her owne contry, to liue in a straunge F Realme. Now when the Sergeants came to take Cratesicles to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying vp her traine, and did comfort her, although Cratesicles otherwise was not affraid to dye, but onely asked this fauor, that she might dye before her litle children.

The ends and death of Cleo-menes and his friends.
The courage of Panteas.

This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman first shew her children before her eyes, and then her selfe afterwards, who in such great griefe and sorowe, sayd no more but thus: Alas, my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wife also, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the slayne bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in such things as she could get, speaking neuer a word, nor shewing any signe or token of griefe: and in fine, hauing prepared her selfe to dye, and plucked of her attyre her selfe, without suffering any other to come neare her, or to see her, but the hangman that was appointed to stryke of her head. In this sorte she dyed as constantly, as the stowtest man liuing could haue done, and had so couered her body, that no man needed after her death to touche her: so carefull was she to her ende, to keepe her honestie, which she had alwayes kept in her life, and in her death was mindefull of her honor, wherewith she decked her body in her life tyme. Thus these Lacedæmon Ladies playing their partes in this pitifull tragedie, contending at the time of death, euen with the corage of the slayne Spartans their contrymen, which of them should dye most constantly: left a manifest prooffe and testimonie, that fortune hath no power ouer fortitude and corage. Shortly after, those that were appoynted to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hong vpon the crosse, they spied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, in so much as no rauening fowle durst come neare him to eate of it: whereuppon the king fell into a superstitious feare, being affrayd that he had offended the goddess. Hereuppon, the Ladyes in his Court began to make many sacrifices of purification, for the clearing of this sinne: perswading them selues, that they had put a man to death, beloued of the gods, and that he had somethinge more in him then a man. The Cleomenes hanging vpon a crosse, had a Serpent wreathed about his head.

Living things breeding of the corruption of dead beastes

Vpon the Dragon is consecrated vnto Princes.

ALEXANDRIANS thereuppon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the sonne of the goddess. Vntill that the learned men brought them from that error, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead and rotten, there breede bees, and of horse also come waspes, & of asses likewise bitels: euen so mens bodies, when the marie melteth and gathereth together, doe bringe forth Serpents. The which comming to the knowledge of the auncients in olde tyme, of all other beastes they did consecrate the Dragon to Kings and Princes, as proper vnto man.

The end of the life of Agis and Cleomenes.

TIBERIUS AND CAIUS GRACCHI.

NOW that we haue declared vnto you the historie of the liues of these two GRECIANS, Agis, and Cleomenes afore sayd: we must also write the historie of two ROMANS, the which is no lesse lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chaunced vnto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the sonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He hauing bene twise Consul, and once Censor, and hauing had the honor of two triumphs: had notwithstanding more honor and fame onely for his valiantnes, for the which he was thought worthy to marye with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hanniball after the death of his father:

The worthines of Tiberius Gracchus the father. Tiberius Gracchus the father, married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio Affrican.

though while he liued he was neuer his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a tyme found two snakes in his bed, and that the Soothsayers and wysards hauing considered the signification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and also to let them both escape, but one onely: assuring him that if he killed the male, he should not liue long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia shoulde dye. Tiberius then louing his wife dearly, thinking it meeter for him also, that he being the elder of both, and she yet a young woman, should dye before her: he slue the male, and let the female escape, howbeit he dyed soone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her house and children, led such a chaste life, was so good to her children, and of so noble a minde: that euery man thought Tiberius a wife man for that he dyed, and left her behind him. She remayning widow, king Ptolomy made sure vnto her, and would haue made her his wife and Queene. But she refused, and in her widowhed lost all her children, but one Daughter, (whome he bestowed vpon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whose liues we presently write: Those the so carefully brought vp, that they being become more ciuill, and better conditioned, then any other ROMANS in their time: euery man iudged, that education preuailed more in them, then nature. For, as in the fauors and pictures of Castor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference discerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wrestling, and the other for running: euen so betwene these two young brethren, amongst other the great likenes betwene them, being both happily borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberrall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithstanding great difference in their actions and doings in the common

wealth: the which I thinke conuenient to declare, before I proceede any farther. First of all, A for the fauor of the face, the looke and mouing of the bodye, Tiberius was much more milde and tractable, and Caius more hotte and earnest. For the first in his orations was very modest, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMANES was the first, that in his oration iected vp and downe the pulpit, and that plucked his gowne ouer his shoullders: as they write of Cleopatra, that he was the first of all Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thighe in his oration. Furthermore, Caius wordes, and the vehemencie of his perswasion, were terrible and full of passion: but Tiberius wordes in contrary manner, were mild, and moued men more to compassion, beeing very proper, and excellently applyed, where Caius wordes were full of finenes and curiositie. The like difference also was betweene them in their fare and dyet. For Tiberius alwayes kept a conuenient ordinarie: and Caius also in respect of other ROMANES, liued very temperately, but in respect of his brothers fare, curiously and superfluously. Inomuch as Drusus on a tyme reproued him, because he had bought certayne Dolphyns of siluer, to the value of a throwland two hundred and fiftie Drachmas for euery pound waight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall disposition of them both, agreeing with the diuersitie of their tongues, the one being milde and plausible, and the other hotte and chollerike: inomuch that otherwhile forgetting him selfe in his oration, agaynst his will he would be very earnest, and strayne his voice beyond his compasse, and so with great vncomelines confound his wordes. Yet finding his owne fault, he deuised this remedye. He had a seruauant called Lucius, a good wise man, who with an instrument of Musicke he had, by the which they teache men to ryse and fall in their tunes, when he was in his oration, he euer stode behinde him: and when he perceyued that his Maisters voyce was a litle too lowde, and that through choller he exceeded his ordinary speache: he played a sotte stoppe behinde him, at the lownde whereof Caius immediately fell from his extremitie, and easily came to him selfe agayne. And here was the diuersitie betweene them. Otherwise, for their hardines against their enemies, the iustice vnto their tennants, the care and paynes in their offices of charge, and also their continencie against voluptuousnes: in all these they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nyne yeares, by reason whereof their severall authoritie and doings in the common wealth fell out at sundry times. And this was one of the chiefest causes why their doings prospered not, because they had not both authoritie in one selfe time, neither could they ioyne their power together: the which if it had mette at one selfe time, had bene of great force, & peraduenture invincible. Wherefore we must write particularly of them both, but first of all we must begin with the elder. He, when he came to mans state, had such a name and estimation, that immediately they made him fellow in the college of the Priests, which at ROME are called Augures: (being those that haue the charge to consider of signes and predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes, then for nobility. The same doth Appius Claudius witness vnto vs, one that hath bene both Consul and Censor, & also President of the Senate, and of greater authoritie then any man in his time. This Appius at a supper when all the Augures were together, after he had saluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in marriage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, and there-withall the mariage was presently concluded betweene them. Thereupon Appius comming E home to his house, at the threshold of his dore he called a lowd for his wife, and told her. Anistia, I haue bestowed our Daughter Clodia. She wondering at it, O goddes sayd she, and what needed all this haste? what couldest thou haue done more, if thou haddest gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her husband? I know that some refer this historie vnto Tiberius, father of these two men we write of, and vnto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the most part of writers agree with that we write at this present. And Polybius him selfe also writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friendes beeing met together, they chose Tiberius before all the other young men of the citie, to marye him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromised, or bestowed upon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the younger being in the warres in AFRIKE vnder Scipio the second, who had maryed his sister: lying in his tent with him, he found his Captaine in- dued with many noble giftes of nature, to allure mens hearts to desire to follow his valiantnes. So in a short tyme he did excell all the young men of this tyme, as well in obedience, as in the valiantnes of his person: inomuch that he was the first man that scaled the walles of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who sayeth that he scaled the walles with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterprife. So that being present, all the campe were in loue with him: & when he was absent, euery man wished for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was chosen Treasorer, and it was his chauce to goe against the NUMANTINES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Consuls, who was an honest man, but yet had the worst lucke of any Captaine the ROMANES had. Notwithstanding, Tiberius wisdome and valiantnes, in this extreame ill lucke of his Captaine, did not onely appeare with great glorye to him, but also most wonderfull; the great obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did so trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell him selfe, whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was ouerthrowen in great foughten fieldes, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NUMANTINES hearing of it, first tooke his campe, and then ranne after them that fled, and setting vpon the rereward, slue them, and enuyronned all his armye. So that they were driuen into straight and narrow places, where out they could by no means escape. Thereupon Mancinus dispayring that he could get out by force, he sent a Herald to the enemies to treat of peace. The NUMANTINES made aunswere, that they would trust no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he shoulde bee sent vnto them: They desired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the young man, because there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly also, as remembering his father Tiberius, who making warres in SPAYNE, and hauing there subdued many nations, he C granted the NUMANTINES peace, the which he caused the ROMANES afterwards to confirme and ratifie. Hereupon Tiberius was sent to speake with them, and partly obeynting that he desired, and partly also granting them that they required: he concluded peace with them, whereby assuredly he saued the liues of twenty thousand ROMANES Citizens, besides slaves and other stragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithstanding, the NUMANTINES tooke the spoyle of all the goods they founde in the ROMANES campe, amonge the which they founde Tiberius bookes of accompt touching the money disbursed of the treasure in his charge. Tiberius beeing maruailous desirous to haue his bookes agayne, returned backe to NUMANTIA with two or three of his friendes onely, though the armye of the ROMANES were gone farre on their waye. So comming to the towne, he spake vnto the gouernors of the citie, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of accompt, because his malicious enemies shoulde not accuse him, calling him to accompt for his doings. The NUMANTINES were very glad of this good happe, and prayed them to come into the towne. He standing still in doubt with him selfe what to doe, whether he shoulde goe into the towne or not: the gouernors of the citie came to him, and taking him by the hande, prayed he would thinke they were not his enemies, but good friendes, and that he would trust them. Whereupon Tiberius thought best to yeelde to their perswasion, beeing desirous also to haue his bookes agayne, and the rather, for feare of offending the NUMANTINES, if he shoulde haue denied and mistrusted them. When he was brought into the citie, they provided his dyner, and were very earnest with him, intreating him to dyne with them. Then they gaue him E his bookes agayne, and offered him moreouer to take what he woulde of all the spoyle they had gotten in the campe of the ROMANES. Howebeit of all that he woulde take nothing but frankensence, which he vsed, when he did any sacrifice for his contry: and then taking his leaue of them, with thanks he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was viterly miliked, as dishonorable to the maiestie of the Empire of ROME. Yet the parents and friendes of them that had serued in this warre, making the greatest part of the people: they gathered about Tiberius, saying that what faultes were committed in this seruice, they were to impute it vnto the Consul Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had saued such a number of ROMANES liues. Notwithstanding, they that were offended with this dishonorable peace, would that therein they shoulde follow the example of their forefathers in the like case. For they sent backe their Captaines naked vnto their enemies, because they were contented the SAMNITES shoulde spoyle them of that they had, to escape with life. Moreouer, they did not onely send them the Captaines and Consuls, but all those also that bare any office in the feld, and had confented vnto that condition: to the ende they might lay all the periuir and breache of peace among them. Herein therefore did manifestly appeare, the love and good will the people did beare vnto Tiberius. For they gaue order, that the Consul Mancinus should be sent naked, and bound vnto the Nymantines, and for Tiberius sake, they pardoned all the rest. I thinke Scipio, who bare great sway at that time in Rome, and was a man of greatest account, did helpe him at that pinche: who notwithstanding was ill thought of, because he did not also saue the Consul Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the Nymantines, considering it was made by Tiberius his friend & kinsman. But these mistakings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friends, & certain learned men, which stirred him vp against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice betwene them, neither followed there any hurte upon it. And surely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio Africanus had bene present, when he passed those thinges he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the siege of Nymantia, when Tiberius upon this occasion passed these lawes. When the Romans in olde tyme had ouercome any of their neighbours, for raunfom they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their land from them, parte whereof they solde by the cryer, for the benefite of the common wealth, and parte altho they referred to their state as demaine, which afterwards was let out to farme for a small reue yearly to the poore Citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the riche men inhaunted the rents, and so began to thrust out the poore men. Thereupon was an ordinance made, that no Citizen of Rome should haue aboue fise hundred acres lande. This lawe for a tyme did bridle the couetousnes of the riche men, and did ease the poore also that dwelt in the contrie, upon the farmes they had taken vp of the common wealth, and so liued with their owne, or with that their Aunccestors had from the beginning. But by proces of time, their riche neighbours, by names of other men, got their farmes out their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly seene in it in their own names. Whereupon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went but with faint corage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp of children: So that in short time, the free men left Italy, and slaues and barbarous people did replenish it, whom the rich men made to plough those landes, which they had taken from the Romans. Caius Lelius, one of Scipios friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuse: but because the chieftest of the citie were against him, fearing it would breake out to some vprore, he desisted from his purpose, and therefore he was called Lelius the wise. But Tiberius being chosen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation afore sayd, being allured vnto it (as diuers writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Blossius the Philosopher: of the which, Diophanes was banished from the citie of Mitylene, and Blossius the Italian from the citie of Cumes, who was scholler and famillier vnto Antipater of Tarsus at Rome, by whom he was honored by certaine workes of Philosophie he dedicated vnto him. And some also do accuse their mother Cornelia, who did twir her sonnes in the teeth, that the Romans did yet call her Scipios mother in law, and not the mother of the Gracchi. Other say it was Spartus Posthumus, a companion of Tiberius, and one that contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the warres, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputacion, and well beloved of euery one: he sought to excell him by attempting this noble enterprife, and of so great expectacion. His owne brother Caius in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the warres of Nymantia, passing through Thyscan, he founde the contrie in manner vnhabited: and they that did followe the ploughe, or keepe beastes, were the moste of them slaues, and barbarous people, comen out of a strange contrie. Whereupon euer after it ranne in his minde to bringe this enterprife to passe, which brought great troubles to their house. But in fine, it was the people onely that moste set his harte afire to couet honor, and that hastened his determination: first bringing him to it by lylles sette vppon euery wall, in euery porche, and vpon the tombes, praying him by them to cause the poore Citizens of Rome to haue their landes restored, which were belonging to the common wealth. This notwithstanding he him selfe made not the lawe alone of his owne head, but did it by the counsell and aduise of the chieftest men of Rome, for vertue and estimation: Amonge the which, Crassus the high Bishoppe was one, and Mutius Scauola the Lawyer, that then was Consul, Counsellors to Tiberius for preferring the law.

A Consul, and Appius Claudius his father in lawe. And truly to seemeth, that neuer lawe was made with greater fauor, then that which he preferred against so great iniustice, and auarice. For thise that should haue bene punished for transgressing the lawe, and should haue had the landes taken from them by force, which they vniuilly kept against the lawe of Rome, and that should also haue bene amerced for it: he ordeyned that they should be payed by the common wealth to the value of the landes, which they held vniuilly, and so should leaue them to the poore Citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now though the reformation established by this lawe, was done with such great fauor: the people notwithstanding were contented, and would forget all that was past, so that they might haue no more wronge offered them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great possessions, hated the lawe, and their auarice, and for spight and selfwill (which would not lesse them yeeld) they were ready to foode with the Lawyer that had preferred the lawe, and sought by all deuise they could to disswade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe to disswade the common wealth, and to make some alteration in the state. But they prevailed not. For Tiberius defending the matter, which of it selfe was good and iust, with such eloquence as might haue iustified an euill cause, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue against him to confute him, when speaking in the behalfe of the poore Citizens of Rome, the people being gathered round about the pulpit for orations) he told them, that the wild beastes through Italy had their dennes and caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were slaine for their contrie, had nothing els but ayer and light, & so were compelled to wander vp & downe with their wiues & children, hauing no resting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their souldiers, when they encourage them in banel to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their owne houses, & their predecestors. For, said he, of such a number of poore Citizens as there be, there can not a man of them shew any auncient house or tombe of their aunccestors: because the poore men doe go to the warres, & be slaine for the rich mens pleasures and wealth: besides they falsely call them Lordes of the earth, where they haue not a handfull of ground, that is theirs. These & such other like wordes being vttered before all the people with such vehemency & trothe, did so moue the common people withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no aduersarye of his able to withstand him. Therefore, leauing to contrary and deny the lawe by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octavius, colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wise young man, and Tiberius very famillier friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the confirmation of this lawe: he prayed them to holde him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the ende, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the riche men that were importunate with him: he did withstande Tiberius lawe, the which was enoughe to ouerthrowe it. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against it, though all the other passe with it, he ouerthroweth it: because they all can doe nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first fauorable law, and in a rage preferred an other more grateful to the common people, as also more extreme against the riche. In that law he ordeyned, that whoeuer had any lande contrary to the auncient lawes of Rome, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fel out cotinual brables in the pulpit for orations, against Octavius: in the which, though they were very earnest and vehement one against another, yet there passed no fowle words from them, (how hot soeuer they were one with another) that should shame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth such a stay & knowledge in a man, not onely in thinges of pleasure to make him regard his credit, both in word & deed: but in passion and anger also, & in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this lawe among others touched Octavius, because he enioyed a great deale of lande that was the common wealthes: he prayed him secretly to contend no more against him, promising him to giue him of his owne, the value of those lands which he should be driuen to forsake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he sawe Octavius would not be perswaded, he then preferred a law, that all Magistrats and Officers should cease their authority, till the lawe were either past, or reiected, by voices of the people: & thereupon be set his own scale upon the shores of the temple of Saturnus where the coffers of the treasure lay, but the treasurers their selves during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, great penalties to be inflicted by the Praetors or such other Magistrates of authority, that should break this order. Hereupon all the Magistrates fearing this penalty, did leave to exercise their office for the time. But when the rich men that were of great livings, changed their apparel, and walked very sadly up and down the market place, and layed secret wayes to kill Tiberius, having hired men to kill him, which caused Tiberius him selfe, openly before them all, to wear a short dagger vnder his longe gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that this lawe should be established, Tiberius called the people to give their voyces, and the rich men on the other side, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the peeples of many voyces, were thrown, so that there was like to fall out great fustie upon it. For the sedition of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius & Fulvius, both the which had ben Consuls, who went vnto him, & besought him with the teares in their eyes, & holding vp their hands, that he would let the lawe alone. Tiberius thereupon, foreseeing the instant danger of some great mischief, as also for the reverence he bare vnto two such noble persons, he stayed a litle, & asked them what they would haue him to doe. They made answer, that they were not able to counsel him in a matter of so great waight, but they praised him notwithstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. Thereupon he granted them presently. But afterwards perceiuing that the Senate saie upon it, & had determined nothing, he cause the rich men were of too great authority: he entred into another deuise that was neither honest nor meete, which was to deprive Octavius of his Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to passe the law. But before he tooke that course, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to stand no more against him, & to doe the people this pleasure, which required a matter iust & reasonable, & onely requested this final recompence for the great paines they tooke in seruice abroad for their contry. Octavius denied him plainly. Then said Tiberius openly that both of them being brethren in one false place and authority, & contrary one to another in a matter of so great waight, this contention could not be possibly ended, without ciuill warre: and that he could see no way to remedy it, vnles one of them two were depofed from their office. Thereupon he bad Octavius begin first with him, & he would rise from the benche with a good will, and become a priuate man, if the people were so contented. Octavius would doe nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his mind, upon a better breathe and consideration: and so dismissed the assemblye for that daye. The next morning the people being againe assembled, Tiberius going vp to his seate, attempted agayne to perswade Octavius to leaue of. In fine, finding him still a man vnremouable, he referred the matter to the voyce of the people; whether they were contented Octavius should be depofed from his office. Nowe there were five and thirtie trybes of the people, of the which, fifteneene of them had already passed their voyces agaynst Octavius, so that there remayned but one trybe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them staye for proceeding any further, and prayed Octavius agayne, embracing him before all the people, with all the intreatye possible: that for selfewill sake he would not suffer such an open shame to be done vnto him, as to be put out of his office: neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of so pitifull a deede. They saie that Octavius at this last intreatie was somewhat moued and wonne by his perswasions, and that weeping, he stayed a longe tyme, and made no answer. But when he looked upon the rich men that stood in a great company together, he was ashamed (I thinke) to haue their ill willes, and rather betooke him selfe to the losse of his office, and so bad Tiberius doe what he would. Thereupon he being depofed by voyces of the people, Tiberius commaunded one of his enfranchised bondmen to pull him out of the pulpit for orations: for he vsed his enfranchised bondmen in steede of Senators. This made the sight so much more lamentable, to see Octavius thus shamefully plucked away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue come vnto him; but the rich men came to rescue him; and would not suffer him to doe him further hurt.

As Octavius faued him selfe toying away alone, after he had bene refused thus from the fury of the people. Moreover, there was a faithfull seruant of Octavius, who stepping before his Maister to saue him from hurt, had his eyes pulled out, against Tiberius minde; who ranne to the rescue with all speede when he heard the noyse. After that, the lawe Agraria passed for diuision of landes, and three Commissioners were appoynted to make inquirie and distribution thereof. The Commissioners appoynted were these: Tiberius him selfe; Appius Claudius his father in lawe; and Caius Gracchus his brother: who was not at that tyme in Rome; but in the campe with Scipio AFRICAN, at the siege of the citie of NVMANTIA. Thus Tiberius very quietly passed ouer these matters; and no man durst withstand him: and furthermore, he substituted in Octavius place no man of qualitie, but only one of his followers, called Mutius. Wherewith the noble men were so sore offended with him, that fearing the increase of his greatnes, they being in the Senate house did what they could possible to doe him despite and shame. For when Tiberius demanded a tent at the charge of the common wealth, when he should goe abroad to make diuision of these landes, as they vially graunted vnto others, that many tymes went in farre meaner commiffions: they flatly denyed him, and through the procurement of P. Nasica (who being a great landed man in his contry, shewed him selfe in this action his mortall enemy, taking it greuously to be compelled to depart from his land) onely graunted him nyne of their oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the people on the other side were all in an vprore against the rich. Infomuch as one of Tiberius friends being deade vpon the sodaine, vpon whose body being deade there appeared very ill signes: the common people ranne sodainly to his buriall, and cryed out that he was poysoned. And so taking vpp the beere whereon his bodie laye vpon their shoulders, they were present at the fire of his funerals, where immediately appeared certaine signes to make them suspect, that in deede there was vehemence cause of presumption he was poysoned. For his belly burst, whereout there issued such abundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetch another, the which also they could not make to burne, vntil that they were compelled to cary the bodie into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much a doe to make it burne. Tiberius seeing that, to make the common people myrne the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his sonnes before them, and besought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that dispayred of his health and safetie. About that tyme dyed Attalus, surnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to Rome, in the which he made the people of Rome his heires. Wherefore Tiberius, still to encrease the good wil of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediately, that the ready money that came by the inheritance of this king should be distributed amongst the poore Citizens, on whose losse it should fall to haue any parte of the diuision of the landes of the common wealth, to furnishe them towards house, and to set vpp their tillage. Furthermore, he sayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to doe to take any order with them, but that the people were to dispose of them, and that he him selfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, infomuch as there was one Pompey a Senator, that standing vp, sayde: that he was next neighbour vnto Tiberius, and that by reason of his neighbourhood he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had giuen him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne besides, for a token that he should one day be king of Rome. And Quintus Metellus also reproued him, for that his father being Censor, the ROMANES hauing supped in the towne, and repaying euery man home to his house, they did put out their torches and lights, because men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they taried too long in companie banquetting: and that in contrary manner, the seditious and needy rabble of the common people did light his sonne home, and accompany him all night long vp and downe the towne. At that tyme there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodnes nor honestie in him, howbeit taken for a great reasoner, and for a fittell questioner and answerer. He prouoked Tiberius to answer him, whether he had not committed a shamefull facte to his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him, that by the lawes of Rome should haue bene holy, & vntouched. The people rooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius also coming out, and hauing assembled the people, commaunded them to bringe this Annius before him, that he might be endoyted in the market place. But he finding him selfe farre inferior vnto Tiberius, both in dignitie and eloquence, ranne to his fine furtill questions, to take a man at his worde: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceede to his accusation, that he would first answer him to a question he would aske him: Tiberius bad him saye what he would. So silence being made, Annius asked him: if thou wouldest defame me, and offer me iniurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he should ryse to take my parte, and anger thee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported that Tiberius was so gauled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his orations of any man: yet at that tyme he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the assembly. Afterwards, vnderstanding that of al the things he did, the deposing of Officius from his office was thought (not onely of the nobilitie, but of the common people also) as fowle and wilfull a parte as euer he played, for that thereby he had imbased, and vterly ouerthrowen the dignitie of the Tribunes, the which was alwayes had in great veneration vntill that present tyme: to excuse him selfe therefore, he made an excellent oration to the people, whereby shall appeare vnto you some special poyntes thereof, to discerne the better the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneship sayd he, in dede was a holy and sacred thing, as particularly consecrated to the people, and established for their benefit and safetie: Where contrariwise, if the Tribune doe offer the people any wronge, he thereby minisheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wills by voyces, besides that, he doth also imbashe his owne authoritie, leauing to doe the thing for the which his authority first was giuen him. Or otherwise we could not choose but suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him, to ouerthrow the Capitoll, or to set fire on the arsenal: and yet notwithstanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the people still, though a lewde Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authoritie and power of the people, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list may, take a Consul, and commit him to prison: and that the people should not withstand the authoritie of the Tribune, who gaue him the same, when he would vse his authoritie to the preiudice of the people? for the people are they that doe choose, both Consul and Tribune. Furthermore, the kingly dignitie (because in the same is conteyned the absolute authoritie and power of all other kindes of Magistrates and offices together) is consecrated with very great and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhead: and yet the people expelled king Tarquin, because he vsed his authoritie with crueltie, and for the iniurie he offered one man onely, the most auncient rule and gouernment, (by the which the foundation of Rome was first layed) was vterly abolished. And who is there in all the citie of Rome to be reckoned so holy as the Vestall Nunnes, which haue the custodie and keeping of the euerlasting fire? and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, she is buried alieue for her offence: for when they are not holy to the goddesses, they lose the libertie they haue, in respect of seruing the goddesses. Euen so, if so al it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, should for the peoples sake be reuerenced any more: Seeing that through his owne folly he hath depriued him selfe of that authoritie they gaue him. And if it be so that he was chosen Tribune by the most parte of the trybes of the people: then by greater reason is he iustly depriued, that by all the whole trybes together is forsaken and depoid? There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate, then things offered vp vnto the goddesses: and yet it was neuer seene that any man did forbid the people to take them, to remoue and transport them from place to place, as they thought good. Euen so, they may as lawfully transference the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offering consecrated to the goddesses. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or Magistrate may lawfully depose him selfe: For, it hath bene often seene, that men in office haue depriued them selues, or otherwise haue sued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friends perceiuing the threats the riche and noble men gaue out against him, they wished him for the safetie of his person, to make sure to be Tribune againe the next year. Whereupon he began to flatter the common people againe afresh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares prescribed, when eury

Citizen

A citizen of Rome was bound to goe to the warres being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull also for men to appeale from sentence of the Iudges vnto the people, and thrust in also amongst the Senators (which then had absolute authoritie to iudge among them selues) a like number of the Roman Knights, and by this meanes fought to weaken and imbashe the authority of the Senate, increasing also the power of the people, more of malice then any reason, or for any iustice or benefit to the common wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voyces of the people for the confirmation of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the stronger in the assembly, because all the people were not yet come together: he fell a quarrelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwayes to winne time, and yet in the end brake vp the assembly, commaunding them to returne the next morning. There he would be the first man in the market place: apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, & looking heauely vpon the matter, praying the people assembled to haue compassion vpon him, saying, that he was affrayed least his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his house to kill him. Thereupon the people were so moued withall, that many of them came and brought their rentes, and lay about his house to watche it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickens, by signes of the which they doe diuine of things to come, brought them vnto him, and cast them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one only, and yet with much a doe, shaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but only lift vp her left wing, and put forth her legge, and so ranne into the cage againe. This signe made Tiberius remember an other he had had before. He had a maruelous fayer helmet and very riche, which he ware in the warres: vnder it were crept two snakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, because of the ill signes of the chickens: notwithstanding, he went out of his house, when he heard that the people were assembled in the Capitoll, but as he went out, he hit his foote such a blow against a stone at the threshold of the doore, that he brake the nayle of his great toe, which fell in suche a bleeding, that it bled through his shooe. Againe, he had not gone farre, but he saw vpon the toppes of a house on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithstanding that there past a great number of people by, yet a stone which one of these rauens cast from them, came & fell hard at Tiberius foote. The fall thereof staied the slowest man he had about him. But Blossius the Philosopher of Cumes that had accompanyd him, told him it were a great shame for him, and enough to kill the harts of all his followers: that Tiberius being the sonne of Gracchus, and nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN, and the chiefe man besides of all the peoples side, for feare of a rauens, should not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing sporte of it, but would plainly tell the people that this was a trick of a tyrant that raigned in dede, and that for pride and disdain did abuse the peoples good wills. Furthermore, diuers messengers came vnto him, and sayd that his friends that were in the Capitoll, sent to pray him to make hast, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honorably receiued: for the people seeing him coming, cried out for ioy to welcome him, and when he was gotten vp to his seate, they shewed them selues both careful and louing towards him, looking warily that none came neere him, but such as they knew well. While Mutius beganne againe to call the tribes of the people to geue their voyces, he could not proceede according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noyse the hindmost people made, thrusting forward, and being driuen backe, and one mingling with an other. In the meane time, Flavius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might see him, and when he saw that his voyce could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a signe with his hande that he had some matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius straight bad them make a lane through the prease. So, with much a doe, Flavius came at length vnto him, and tolde him, that the riche men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Consull to their wills, determined them selues to come and kill him, hauing a great number of their frendes, and bondmen armed for the purpose. Tiberius immediately declared this conspiracy vnto his friends and followers: who straight girt their long gownes vnto them, and brake the sergeants iaulens which they carried in their handes to make roome among the people, and tooke the trunchions of the same to resist those that would set upon them. The people also that stood furthest of, marveled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a signe to tell them the danger he was in, layd both his hands on his head, because they could not heare his voyce for the great noyle they made. His enemies seeing the signe he gaue, ranne presently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall bande or diadem of the people, and that it was an euident signe, because they sawe him clappe his handes upon his head. This tale troubled all the companie. Whereupon Nasica belought the Consul, chiefe of the Senate, to help the common wealth, and to take away this tyrant. The Consul gently aunswere agayne, that he would vse no force, neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as also he would not receiue Tiberius, nor protect him, if the people by his perswasion or commaundement, should commit any acte contrarie to the law. Nasica then rising in anger, fith the matter is so, sayd he, that the Consul regardeth not the common wealth: all you then, that will defende the authoritie of the law, follow me. Thereupon he cast the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, & went straight to the Capitoll. They that followed him also tooke their gownes, and wrapt them about their armes, and layed at as many as they might, to make them geue way: and yet very few of the people durst meete with such states as they were to stay them, because they were the chiefe men of the citie, but euery man flying from them, they fell one on an others necke for haile. They that followed them, had brought from home great leauers & clubbes, and as they went, they tooke vp seete of tressles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowen and broken, running away, and hyed them a pace to meete with Tiberius, striking at them that stood in their way: so that in short space they had disperfed all the common people, and many were slaine flying. Tiberius seeing that, betooke him to his legges to saue him selfe, but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne, and stayed him: but he leauing his gowne behinde him, ranne in his coate, and running fell vpon them that were downe before. So, as he was rising vp agayne, the first man that strake him, and that was plainly seene strike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Satureius: who gaue him a great rappe on the head with the foote of a chaire, & the second blow he had, was geuen him by Lucius Rufus that boasted of it, as if he had done a notable acte. In this tumult, there were slaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with stauies and stones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the first sedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murder, and bloodshed, since the expulsion of the kings. But for all other former dissensions (which were no trifles) they were easily pacified, either partie geuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the commons, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it seemeth, that Tiberius him selfe would easily haue yeelded also, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perswasion, so they had ment good faith, and would haue killed no man: for at that time he had not in all, aboue 3000. men of the people about him. But surely it seemes this conspiracie was executed against him, more for very spite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparent cause they presupposed against him. For prooffe hereof may be alleaged, the barbarous cruelty they vsed to his body being dead. For they would not suffer his owne brother to haue his bodie to burie it by night, who made earnest sute vnto them for it: but they threw him amongst the other bodies into the riuier, and yet this was not the worst. For, some of his friends they banished without forme of law, and others they put to death, which they could meete withall. Among the which, they slue Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they inclosed in a pye among snakes and serpentes, and put him to death in this sorte. Blossius also the Philosopher of Cumes, was brought before the Consuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confessed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commaunded him. When Nasica did aske him, and what if he had commaunded thee to set fire on the Capitoll? He made him aunswere, that Tiberius would neuer haue geuen him any suche commaundement. And when diuers others also were still in hand with him about that question: but if he had commaunded thee? I would fure haue done it, sayd he: for he would neuer haue commaunded me to haue done it, if it had not bene for the commoditie of the people. Thus he escaped at that time, and afterwards fled into Asia vnto Aristonicus, whom misfortune hauing ouerthrowen, he slue him selfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that present time,

As there no more withstand the law Agraria, for diuision of the lands of the common wealth, but suffered the people to appoint an other Commisioner for that purpose, in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Crassus was chosen, being allied vnto Tiberius, for Publius Crassus (Tiberius brother) had married his daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius his souldier, who was not Crassus daughter, Caius married, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the Allobroges. Howbeit the best wryters and authority agree with that we wryte. But whosoever was done, the people were maruelously offended with his death, and men might easily perceiue, that they looked but for time and opportunity to be reuenged, and did presently thereon Nasica to accuse him. Whereupon the Senate fearing some trouble towards him, deuised a way vpon no occasion, to sende him into Asia. For the common people did not dissimble the malice they bare him when they met him, but were verie round with him, and called him tyrant, and murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his handes in the blood of the holy Tribune, and within the most sacred temple of all the citie. So in the ende he was infected to forsake Rome, though by his office he was bounde to solemnise all the greatest sacrifices, because he was then chiefe Bishoppe of Rome. Thus, trauieling out of his contrie, he meant meane man, and troubled in his minde: he dyed shortly after, not farre from the citie of Perinthum. Truly it is not greatly to be wondered at, though the people so much hated Nasica, considering that Scipio the African him selfe (whom the people of Rome for iustice and valour had loued better then any man else whatsoeuer) was like to haue lost all the peoples good will, if they bare him, because that being at the siege of Nymantia, when newes was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verse of Horace:
Such end upon him euer light, Which in such doings doth delight.
 Furthermore, being asked in the assembly of the people, by Caius, & Publius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he answered them, that he did not like his doings. After that the people handled him very christly, & did euer breake of his oration, which they neuer did before: he him selfe also would reuile the people euen in the assembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the first, because he feared the enemies of his deade brother, or otherwise for that he sought meanes to make them more hated of the people: he absented him selfe for a time out of the common assembly, and kept at home and meddled not, as a man contented to liue meanelly, without busying him selfe in the common wealth: in so much as he made men thinke and reported both, that he did utterly mislike those matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares younger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirty yeare old when he was slaine. But in proceesse of time, he made his manners and conditions (by little and little) appeare, who hated sloth and euill sortie, and was least of all geuen vnto any couetous minde of getting: for he gaue him selfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wings afterwarde to practise in the common wealth. So that it appeared plainly, that when time came, he would not stand still, and looke on. When one Pestus a frende of his was sued, he tooke upon him to defend his cause in courte. The people that were present, and heard him speake, they leaped for ioy to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators besides were but children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be affrayed agayne, and whispered among them selues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chaunced so that he was chosen Treasorer, and it was his fortune to goe into the Ile of Sardinia, with the Consul Orestes. His enemies were glad of that, and he him selfe was not sorry for it. For he was a martiall man, and as skilfull in armes, as he was wise and excellent Orator: but yet he was affrayed to come into the pulpit for Orations, and misliked to deale in matters of state, albeit he could not altogether deny the people, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cause therefore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might absente him selfe for a time out of Rome: though diuers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and desirous of the common peoples good will and fauor, then his brother had bene before him. But in deede he was cleane contrarie: for it appeared that at the first he was drawn rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator also sayth, that Caius was bent altogether to flie from office in the common wealth, and to liue quietly as a priuat man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his sleepe, and calling him by his name, sayd vnto him: brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canst not possible escape? For we were both predestined to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefite of the people. Now when Caius arrived in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the young men of his age in hardines against his enemies, in iustice to his inferiors, and in loue & obedience towards the Consul his Captaine: but in temperance, sobrietie, and in painfullnes, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chaunce fell out very sharpe, & full of sickenes in SARDINIA: whereupon the Consul sent vnto the cities to helpe his souldiers with some clothes: but the townes sent in poste to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegacion reasonable, whereupon they wrote to the Consul to finde some other meanes to clothe his people. The Consul could make no other shift for them, and so the poore souldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went him selfe vnto the cities and so perswaded them, that they of them selues sent to the ROMANES campe such thinges as they lacked. This being caried to ROME, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauor, and in dede it made the Senate also affrayed. In the necke of that, there arrived Ambassadors of AFRICK at ROME, sent from king Micipsa, who told the Senate that the king their maister, for Caius Gracchus sake, had sent their armie come into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadors out of the Senate, and so gaue order that other souldiers shoulde be sent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Orestes should still remaine Consul there, meaning also to continue Caius their Treasurer. But when he hearde of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to ROME in choller. When men saw Caius returned to ROME vnlooked for, he was reproofed for not only by his enemies, but by the common people also: who thought his returne verie straunge before his Captaine, vnder whom he was Treasurer. He being accused hereof before the Censors, prayed he might be heard. So, answering his accusation, he so turned the peoples mindes that heard him, that they all sayd he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had serued twelue years in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeres: and that he had continued Treasurer vnder his Captaine, the space of three yeres, where the law gaue him libertie to returne at the end of the yere. And that he alone of all men eile that had bene in the warres, had caried his purse full, and brought it home empty: where others hauing dronke the wyne which they caried thither in vessells, had afterwarde brought them home full of gold & siluer. Afterwarde they went about to accuse him as accessarie to a conspiracie, that was reuealed in the citie of FRIGELLIS. But hauing cleared all that suspicion, and being discharged, he presently made sute to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of qualitie his sworne enemies. On the other side also he had so great fauor of the common people, that there came men out of all partes of ITALIE to be at his election, & that such a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voyces vpon the toppes of houses. Nowe the noble men could no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was only pronounced the fourth. But when he was once posselt officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, because he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamitie offered him: which made him bolde to speake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters fouer he spake of, he alwayes fell in talke of that, remembering them what matters had passed: & laying before them the examples of their auncesters who in olde time had made warre with the PHALISCS, by the meanes of one Genucius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniurie: who also did condemne Caius Petunius to death, because that he only would not geue a Tribune place, comming through the market place. Where these sayd he, that standing before you in sight, haue slaine my brother Tiberius with staues, and haue dragged his bodie from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the riuier: and with him also haue most cruellie slaine all his frendes they coule come by, without any lawe on iustice at all. And yet by an ancient custome of long time

*Caius Gracchus returns

of the people.*

A time obserued in this citie of ROME, when any man is accused of treason, and that of duty he must appeare at the time appointed him: they doe notwithstanding in the morning sende a trumpet to his house, to summonie him to appeare: and moreover the Iudges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremony was performed: so carefull and respectiue were our predecessors, where it touched the life of any ROMANE. Now Caius hauing first stirred vp the people with these perswasions (for he had a maruelous lowde voyce) he preferred two lawes.

The first, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, should neuer after be capable of any other office.

The seconde, that if any Consul had banished any citizen without lawfull accusation, the sentence and hearing of the matter should pertaine to the people.

The first of these two lawes did plainly defame Octavius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depofed from the Tribunshippe. The seconde also touched Popilius, who being Prator, had banished his brother Tiberius frendes: whereupon he stayed not the trial, but willingly exiled him selfe out of ITALIE. And touching the first law, Caius him selfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people, that he had saued Octavius at the request of his mother Cornelia. The people were verie glad of it, and confirmed it, honoring her no lesse for respect of her sonnes, then also for Scipios sake her father. For afterwarde they call her image in brasse, & set it vp with this inscription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many comon matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, & eloquently pleaded in her behalfe, by Caius against her aduersaries. As when he sayd vnto one of them: how darest thou presume to speake euill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her sonne? And the other partie also that slandered her, being sorely suspected for a Sodomite: and art thou so impudent, sayd he, to shew thy face before Cornelia? Hast thou brought forth children as she hath done? And yet it is wel knowe to all men in ROME, that she being but a woman, hath liued longer without a man, than thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words sharpe & stinging, and many such like are to be gathered out of his wrytinges. Furthermore he made many other lawes afterwarde to increase the peoples authoritie, and to imbase the Senates greatnes.

The first was, for the restoring of the Colonies to ROME, in diuiding the landes of the common wealth vnto the poore citizens that should inhabite there.

The other, that they shoulde apparell the souldiers at the charge of the common wealth, and that it should not be deducted out of their paye: and also, that no citizen should be billed to serue in the warres, vnder seuentene yeres of age at the least.

An other law was, for their confederats of ITALIE: that through all ITALIE they shoulde haue as free voyces in the election of any Magistrate, as the naturall citizens of ROME it selfe.

An other setting a reasonable price of the corne that should be distributed vnto the poore people.

An other touching iudgement, whereby he did greatly minish the authority of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Iudges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honored and feared of the people, and the ROMANE Knights: and now he ioyned three hundred ROMANE Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it so to passe, that all matters iudiciall shoulde be equally iudged, among those six hundred men. After he had passed this law, it is reported he was verie curious in obseruing all other thinges, but this one thing specially: that where all other Orators speaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senators sate, and to that side of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrarie manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards the other side of the market place, and after that kept it constantly, and neuer failed. Thus, by a litle turning and altering of his looke only, he remoued a great matter. For he so transferred all the government of the common wealth from the Senate, vnto the iudgement of the people: to teach the Orators by his example, that in their Orations they shoulde behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people hauing not only confirmed the law he made touching the Iudges, but geuen him also full power and authoritie to choose amonget the ROMANE Knights suche Iudges as he liked of: he founde thereby he had absolute power in his owne hands, inſomuche as the Senators them ſelues diſke counſell of him. So did he ever give a good counſell, and did preferre matters meete for their honor. As amongſt others, the lawe he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Vicepraetor had ſent out of SPAYNE: which was a good and honorable acte. He perſwaded the Senate that the corne might be ſolde, and ſo to ſend backe againe the money therof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came: and therewithall to puniſh Fabius for that he made the Empire of ROME hatefull and intolerable vnto the prouinces and ſubiectes of the ſame. This matter wanne him great loue and commendation of all the prouinces ſubiect to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the reſtoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high wayes, for building of garners for prouiſion of corne. And to bring all theſe things to paſſe, he him ſelfe tooke vpon him the onely care and enterpriſe, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of ſo great affaires. For, he followed all thoſe things ſo earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: inſomuch that they who moſt hated and feared him, wondred moſt to ſee his diligence and quick diſpatche in matters. The people alſo wondred muche to beholde him only, ſeeing alwaies ſuche a number of laborers, artiſcers, Ambaſſadors, officers, ſouldiers, and learned men, whom he eaſily ſatiſfied and diſpatched, keeping ſtill his eſtate, and yet viſing great curteſie and ciuilitie, entertaining euery one of them priuately: ſo that he made his accuſers to be ſound lyes, that ſayd he was a ſtately man, and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conuerſation and deedes, then he was otherwiſe in his Orations. But the greateſt paines and care he tooke vpon him was, in ſeeing the high wayes mended, the which he woulde haue as well done, as profitable done. For he would caſt the cawcies by the lyne in the ſoſteſt ground in the fields, and then woulde paue them with hard ſtone, and caſt a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he cauſed to be brought thither. When he found any low or waterie places which the riuers had eaten into, he raiſed them vp, or elſe made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equall to either ſide of the cawcie: ſo that all his worke caried a goodly leauell withall euen by the lyne or plummet, which was a pleaſure to beholde it. Furthermore, he deuised theſe high wayes by myles, euery myle containing eight furlonges, and at euery myles ende he ſet vp a ſtone for a marke. At either end alſo of theſe high wayes thus paued, he ſet certaine ſtones of conuenient height, a prety way a ſunder, to helpe the trauellers by to take their horſe backes againe, without any helpe. The people for theſe things highly praiſing & extolling him, and being ready to make ſhew of their loue and good will to him any maner of way: he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a requeſt to make vnto them, the which if it woulde pleaſe them to graunt him, he woulde thinke they did him a maruelous pleaſure: and if they denied him alſo, he cared not muche. Then euery man thought it was the Conſulſhippe he ment to aſke, and that he woulde ſue to be Tribune and Conſul together. But when the day came to chooſe the Conſuls, euery man looking attentively what he woulde doe: they marueled when they ſawe him come downe the fieldes of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his ſute for the Conſulſhippe. Therein he ſerued Fannius turne, for he was preſently choſen Conſul: and Caius Gracchus was the ſeconde time choſen Tribune againe, not of his owne ſute, but by the good will of the people. Caius perceiving that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Conſul was but a ſlacke frende vnto him, he began againe to currie fauor with the common people, and to preferre new lawes, ſetting forth the lawes of the Colonies, that they ſhould ſend of the poore citizens to replenish the cities of TARENTVM and CAPVA, & that they ſhould graunt all the Latines the freedom of ROME. The Senate perceiving his power grew great, and that in the end he woulde be ſo ſtrong that they could not withſtande him: they deuised a new and ſtraunge way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not altogether very honeſt. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius, called Linus Drusus, a man nobly borne, and as well brought vp as any other ROMANE: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferior to the greateſt men of eſtimation in ROME. The chiefeſt Senators went vnto him, and perſwaded him to take parte with them againſt Caius, not to vie any force or violence againſt the people to withſtand them in any thing, but contrarily to graunt them thoſe things which were more honeſtly

A honeſtie for them to deny them with their ill will. Linus offering to pleaſure the Senate with his authority, preferred lawes neither honorable nor profitable to the common wealth, & were to no other ende, but contending with Caius, who ſhould moſt flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their common plaires, to ſhew the people paſtime. Whereby the Senate ſhewed, that they did not ſo much miſlike Caius doings, as for the deſire they had to ouerthrow him & his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the replenishing of the two cities, and deſired to ſend the honeſteſt citizens thither: they objected againſt him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other ſide alſo they fauored Drusus, who preferred a law that they ſhould replenish twelue Colonies, & ſhould ſend to euery one of them three thouſande of the pooreſt citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore citizens with an annual rent for the lands that were deuised vnto them: Linus in contrary manner did pleaſe them by diſburdening them of that rent & payment, letting the haue the lands ſcotfree. Furthermore alſo, where Caius did anger the people, becauſe he gaue all the Latines the freedom of ROME to geue their voyces in chooſing of Magiſtrates as freely as the naturall ROMANES: when Drusus on thother ſide had preferred a law that thenceforth no ROMANE ſhould whip any ſouldier of the Latines with rods to the warres, they liked the law, & paſt it. Linus alſo in euery law he put forth, ſaid in all his orations, that he did it by the counſell of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: and this was all the good he did in his office vnto the common wealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleaſed with the Senate, & where they did before hate all the noble men of the Senate, Linus tooke away that malice, when the people ſaw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the common wealth, with the conſent & furtheraunce of the Senate. The only thing alſo that perſwaded the people to thinke that Drusus ment vprightly, & that he only reſpected the profit of the common people was: that he neuer preferred any law for him ſelfe, or for his owne benefit. For in the reſtoring of theſe Colonies which he preferred, he alwaies ſent other Commiſſioners, & gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any money him ſelfe: where Caius tooke vpon him the charge & care of all things himſelfe, & ſpecially of the greateſt matters. Rubrius alſo an other Tribune, hauing preferred a law for the reedifying & replenishing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had raſed and deſtroyed: it was Caius happe to be appointed one of the Commiſſioners for it. Whereupon he tooke ſhippe, & ſailed into DAFRIE, Drusus in the meane time taking occaſion of his abſence, did as much as might be to ſecke the fauor of the common people, and ſpecially by accuſing Fulvius, who was one of the beſt friends Caius had, & whom they had alſo choſen Commiſſioner with him for the diuiſion of theſe landes among the citizens, whom they ſent to replenish theſe Colonies. This Fulvius was a ſeditious man, & therefore maruelouſly hated of the Senate, & withall ſuſpected alſo of them that tooke parte with the people, that he ſecretly practiſed to make their confederates of ITALIE to rebell. But yet they had no euident prooff of it to iuſtifie it againſt him, more then that which he himſelfe did verifie, becauſe he ſemed to be offended with the peace & quietnes they enjoyed. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of Caius ouerthrow, becauſe that Fulvius was partly hated for his ſake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his houſe, without any maniſteſt cauſe how he ſhould come to his death ſo ſuddenly: (ſaying that there appeared certaine blinde markes of ſtripes on his body that had bene geuen him: as we haue declared at large in his life) the moſt parte of the ſuſpicion of his death was layed to Fulvius, being his mortall enemy, & becauſe the ſame day they had bene at great wordes together in the pulpit for orations. So was Caius Gracchus alſo partly ſuſpected for it. Howſoeuer it was, ſuch a horrible murder as this, of ſo famous & worthy a man as any was in ROME, was yet notwithstanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it: becauſe the common people would not ſuffer the accuſation to goe forward, fearing leaſt Caius would be found in fault, if the matter ſhould go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRICA about the reedifying and replenishing of the city of CARTHAGE againe, the which he named IVNONIA: the voice goeth that he had many ill ſignes & tokens appeared vnto him. For the ſtaffe of his enſigne was broken with a vehemet blaſt of wind, & with the force of the enſigne bearer that held it faſt on thother ſide. There came a ſlaw of winde alſo that caried a way the sacrifices vpon the aulters and blew them quite out of the circuite which was marked A out for the compasse of the city. Furthermore, the woulues came and tooke away the markes which they had set downe to limite the bonds of their circuite, & caried him quite away. This notwithstanding, Caius hauing dispatched all things in the space of three score & ten daies, he returned incontinently to ROME, vnderstanding that Fulvius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the nobility, & a man of great credit with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Consulshippe, by Caius practise, who caused Fannius to be chosen: he had good hope this yere to speede, for the great number of friends that furthered his sute. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to set Caius beside the saddle, & the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of such deuises as his were: because there were diuers others that preferred the like to please the people withal, & yet with the Senates great good will & fauor. So Caius being returned to ROME, he remoued from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house vnder the market place, to shew him selfe thereby the lowlier & more popular, because many of the manner sorte of people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to goe forward with the rest of his lawes, & to make the people to establish the, a great number of people repairing to ROME out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counselled the Consul Fannius to make proclamation, that all those which were no natural ROMANES, resident & abiding within the city selfe of ROME: that they should depart out of ROME. Besides all this, there was a straunge proclamation made, and neuer seene before: that none of all the friends & confederates of the ROMANES, for certaine daies should come into ROME. But Caius on thother side set vp bills on euery post, accusing the Consul for making so wicked a proclamation: & further, promised the confederates of ROME to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Consuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not. For when he saw one of Fannius sergeants carry a friend of his to prison, he held on his way, & would see nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of like-hood because he feared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or else because he was loth (as he said) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which fought it of him. Furthermore, he chaunced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. The people were to see the pastime of the sword plaiers or fencers at the sharp, within the very market place, and there were diuers of the officers that to see the sport, did set vp scaffoldes D rounde about, to take money for the standing. Caius commaunded them to take them downe againe, because the poore men might fee the sport without any cost. But not a man of the would yeeld to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, & then he tooke all his laborers he had vnder him, & went & ouerthrew the scaffoldes euery one of the: so that the next morning all the market place was cleare for the common people, to see the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruelously, & tooke him for a worthy man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, & tooke him for a bold presumptuous man. This seemeth to be the chiefe cause why he was put from his third Tribuneship, where he had the most voices of his side: because his colleagues, to be reuenged of the part he had plaied the, of malice & spight, made false report of the voices. Howbeit there E is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulse, & it is reported he spake somewhat too proudly to his enemies, that were mery with the matter, & laughed him to scorn: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkly his deedes had wrapt them in. Furthermore, his enemies hauing chosen Optimius Consul, they began immediately to reuoke diuers of Caius lawes: as among the rest, his doings at CARTHAGE for the redifying of that city, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, because they might haue iust occasion of anger to kill him. Caius notwithstanding did patiently beare it at the first but afterwards his friends, & specially Fulvius, did encourage him so, that he began againe to gather men to resist the Consul. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, secretly hying a great number of straungers which she sent vnto ROME, as if they had bene F reapers, or haruest men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter, vnto her sonne in ci-phers. And yet other write to the contrary, that she was very angry he did attempt those things.

A When the day came that they should proceede to the reuocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitoll. There when the Consul Optimius had done sacrifice, one of Caius sergeants called Quintus Antyllus, carrying the entrails of the beaſt sacrificed, said vnto Fulvius, and others of his tribe that were about him: giue place to honest men, vile citizens that ye be. Some say also, that besides these iniurious wordes, in skorne & contempt he held out his naked arme to make the ashamed. Whereupon they slue him presently in the field with great bokins to wyte with, which they had purposely made for that intent. Hereupon the common people were maruelously offended for this murder, & the chiefe men of both sides all were diuersly affected. For Caius was very fory for it, & bitterly reposed them that were about him, saying, that they had giuen their enemies the occasion they looked for, to set vpon the Optimius D the Consul in contrary maner, taking this occasion, rose apon it, & did stirre vp the people to be reuenged. But there fell a shower of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Consul hauing assembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was dispatching causes with-in, some had take the body of Antyllus & layed it naked vpon the beere, & so caried it through the market place (as it was agreed vpon before amongst the) & brought it to the Senate dore: where they began to make great mone & lamentation, Optimius knowing the meaning of it, but yet he dissembled it, & seemed to wonder at it. Whereupon the Senators went out to see what it was, & finding this beere, in the market place, some fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cried out that it was a shamefull act, & in no wise to be suffered. But on the other side, this did reuise the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednes of the ambitious noble C men: who hauing the felues before slaine Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune, & within the Capitoll it selfe, & had also cast his body into the riuier, did now make an honorable shew openly in the market place, of the body of a sergeant Antyllus (who though he were wrongfully slaine, yet had himselfe geuen the cause that slue him, to do that they did) & all the whole Senate were about the beere to bewaile his death, & to honor the funerals of a hyerling, to make the people all kill him, that was only left the protector & defender of the people. After this, they went againe vnto the Capitoll, & there made a decree, whereby they gaue the Consul Optimius extraordinary power & authority, by absolute power to provide for the safety of the common wealth, to preferue the city, & to suppress the tyrans. This decree being established, the Consul presently commaunded the Senators that were present there, to go arme the felues: & ap- D pointed the ROMANES Knights, that the next morning betimes euery man should bring two of their men armed with the. Fulvius on the other side, he prepared his force against them, & assembled the common people together. Caius also returning from the market place, staid before the image of his father, & looked earnestly apon it without euer a word speaking, only he burst out a weeping, and fetching a great sigh, went his way. This made the people to pite him that saw him: so that they talked among them felues, that they were but beaſts & cowards at such a straight to forsake fo worthy a man. Therupon they went to his house, staid there all night & watched before his gate: not as they did that watched with Fulvius, that passed away the night in guseling and drinking drunke, crying out, and making noyse, Fulvius him selfe being dronke first of all, who both spake and did many thinges farre vnmeet for his calling. For they that E watched Caius on thother side, were very forowfull, and made no noyse, euen as in a common calamitie of their contrie, deuising with them felues what would fall out apon it, waking, and sleeping one after an other by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fulvius did awake him, who slept yet foundly for the wine he dranke ouer night, and they armed them felues with the spoiles of the GALLES that hong rounde about his house, whom he had ouercome in battell the same yeare he was Consul: and with great cries, and thundering threats, they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caius would not arme him selfe, but went out of his house in a long gowne, as if he would haue gone simply into the market place according to his wonted manner, sauing that he caried a short dagger at his girdel vnder his gowne. So as he was going out of his house, his wife stayed him at the dore, and holding him by the one hand, and a litle child F of his in her other hand, she sayd thus vnto him: Alas Caius, thou doest not now goe as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to speake to the people, neither to preferre any new lawes: neither doest thou goe vnto an honest warre, that if vnfortunately that should happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the least mourne for thy death with A honor. But thou goest to put thy selfe into bloodie burchers handes, who most cruelly haue slaine thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goest, a naked man vnarmed, intending rather to suffer, then to doe hurt. Besides, thy death can bring no benefit to the common wealth. For the worse part hath now the vpper hand, considering that sentence passeth by force of sword. Had thy brother bene slaine by his enemies, before the cite of Nymantia: yet had they gotten vs his bodie to haue buried him. But such may be my misfortune, that I may presently go to pray the riuier or sea to geue me thy bodie, which as thy brothers they haue likewise throught wen into the same. Alas, what hope or trust is left vs now, in lawes or gods, sithence they haue slaine Tiberius? As Licinia was making this pitifull mone vnto him, Caicus fayer and softly pulled his hand from her, and left her, geuing her neuer a word, but went on with his friends. B But she reaching after him to take him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatting there a great while, speaking neuer a word: vntill at length her seruants tooke her vp in a swoone, and caried her so vnto her brother Crassus. Now Fulvius, by the perswasion of Caicus, when all their faction were met: sent his younger sonne (which was a prety fayer boy) with a Heraulds rodde in his hand for his safetie. This boy humbly presenting his dutie, with the teares in his eyes, before the Consul and Senate, offered them peace. The most of them that were present thought verie well of it. But Optimius made aunswere saying, that it became them not to send messengers, thinking with fayer wordes to winne the Senate: but it was their dutie to come the selfes in persons, like subiects & offenders to make their triall, & so to craue pardon, & to seeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commaunded the boy he should not retorne C againe to them, but with this condicion he had prescribed. Caicus (as it is reported) was ready to go and cleare him selfe vnto the Senate: but the residue would not suffer him to go. Whereuppon Fulvius sent his sonne backe againe vnto them, to speake for them as he had done before. But Optimius that was desirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and committed him in safe custodie, & then went presently against Fulvius with a great number of footemen well armed, & of Cabret archers besides: who with their arrowes did more trouble & hurt their enemies, then with any thing else, that within a while they all began to flie. Fulvius on the other side fled into an old hottehouse that no body made reckoning of, and there being found shortly after, they slue him, and his eldest sonne. Now for Caicus, he fought not at all, but being mad with him selfe, and grieved to see such bloodshed: he got him into the temple of Diana, D where he would haue killed him selfe, had not his very good friends Pomponius and Licinius saved him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his sword from him, and counselled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, and holding vp both his hands vnto the goddesse, he besought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude & treason. For the common people (or the most parte of them) plainly turned their coats, when they heard proclamation made, that all men had pardon graunted them, that would retorne. So Caicus fled anon, and his enemies followed him so neere, that they ouertooke him upon the wodden bridge, where two of his friends that were with him stayed, to defende him against his followers, and bad him in the meane time make shift for him selfe, whilst they fought with them upon the bridge: and so they did, and kept them that not a man got the bridge of them, vntill they were both slaine: Nowe there was none that fled with Caicus, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithstanding, euerie man did still encorage and counsell him, as they do men to winne a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horse, though he often required it, because he sawe his enemies so neere vnto him. This notwithstanding, by their defense that were slaine upon the bridge, he got ground on them so, that he had leasure to crepe into a litle grove of wodde which was consecrated to the furies. There his seruant Philocrates slue him, and then slue him selfe also, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the maiister & seruant were ouertaken, and taken alue: and that his seruant did so straight embrace his maiister that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was slaine him selfe. So Fulvius frendes called Septimulcius, tooke the head from the other by the way, because proclamation Fulvius sent his sonne to the Consul with a litle wandie rodde to offer peace.

The death of Fulvius and his eldest sonne.

The flight of Caicus.

The faithfulness of Caicus Gracchus seruants.

A macion was made before they fought by trompet, that whosoener brought the heades of Fulvius and Caicus, they should be payed the weight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimulcius caried Caicus head vpon the toppe of his speare vnto Optimius: wheruppon the scales being brought to wey it, it was found that it weyed seuentene pounce weight and two third partes of a pound, because Septimulcius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in lieu thereof had filled his scull with lead. Now the other also that brought Fulvius head, because they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodie of these two men, Caicus Gracchus and Fulvius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thousand that were slaine) were all thrown into the riuier, their goods confiscate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Furthermore, they tooke from Licinia Caicus wife, her ioynter: but yet they delt more cruelly and beastly with the young boy, Fulvius sonne: who had neither lift vp his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but only came to the to make peace before they fought, whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battell ended, they put him to death. But yet that which most of all other grieved the people, was the temple of concord, the which Optimius caused to be built: for it appeared that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of Rome. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription of the temple these verses:

A furious fait and full of beastly shame.

This temple built, that beareth conquestes name.

C This Optimius was the first man at Rome, that being Consul, vsurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or iustice condemned three thousand citizens of Rome, besides Fulvius Flaccus, (who had also bene Consul, and had receiued the honor of triumphe) and Caicus Gracchus a young man in like case, who in vertue & reputation excelled all the men of his yeares. This notwithstanding, could not keepe Optimius from theuerie and extortion. For when he was sent Ambassador vnto Iugurthe king of Nymidia, he was bribed with money: & therupon being accused, he was most shamefully conuicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his dayes with this reproch and infamy, hated, and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the ouerthrow he delt beastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But shortly after, it appeared to the world, how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren D of the Gracchi. For they made images and statues of them, and caused them to be set vpin an open and honorable place, consecrating the places where they had bene slaine: and many of them also came and offred to them, of their first frutes and flowers, according to the time of the yeere, & went thither to make their prayers on their knees, as vnto the temples of the gods. Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble hart: and as for the chappells which they built & consecrated vnto them in the place where they were slaine, she said no more, but that they had such graues, as they had deserued. Afterwards she dwelt continually by the mount of Misene, and neuer chaunged her manner of life. She had many friends; and because she was a noble Ladie, and loued euer to welcome strangers, she kept a very good houle, and therefore had alwayes great repaire vnto her, of Gracians & learned E men: besides, there was no king nor Prince, but both receiued gifts from her, and sent her againe. They that frequented her copany, delighted maruelously to heare her report the dedes and maner of her fathers life, Scipio Africanus: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the actes and death of her two sonnes, Tiberius and Caicus Gracchi, without shedding teare, or making any thew of lamentacion or grieve, no more then if he had told an history vnto them that had requested her. In so much some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercome and taken her reason and sence from her, to feelee any sorowe. But in deede they were senselesse to say so, not understanding, howe that to be noble borne, and vertuouls F brought vp, doth makemen temperaty to digest sorow, and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue, which regardeth honestie in all respects, but yet with any aduerfity she can not take away the temperaunce from them, whereby they patiently beare it.

THE COMPARISON OF Tiberius and Caius Gracchi with Agis and Cleomenes.

The wisdom of the Gracchi.

NOW that we be come to the end of this history, we are to compare the A lines of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi: their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best geuen to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp, as any ROMANES that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they hauing bene very ill brought vp, both for learning and good manners, for lacke whereof the oldest men were almost spoyled: yet did they notwithstandinge make them selues the first maisters and example of sobrietie, temperaunce, and simplicitie of life. Furthermore, the two first hauing liued in that time, when ROME flourished most in honor and vertuous desires: they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their auncesters. These two last also being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrarie disposition, and finding their contric altogether without any order, and infected with dissolute life: were not therefore any whit the more moued with desire to do well. Furthermore, the greatest praise they gaue vnto the two Gracchi, was, their abstinence and integritie from taking of money all the time they were in office, and delt in matters of state, euer keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a pennie wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on thother side was offended if any man praised him, for that he tooke nothing from an other man: seeing that he dispossest him selfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in ready coyne to the value of six hundred talents. Whereby men may easely iudge, how grievous a sinne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man: seeing that he thought it a kinde of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruelous great difference in their alterations, and rening of the state, which they did both preferre. For the actes of the two ROMANES were to mend high wayes, and to reedifie and replenish decayed townes: and the worthiest acte Tiberius did, was the lawe Agraria, which he brought in for diuiding

A diuiding of the lands of the common wealth amongst the poore Citizens. And the best acte his brother Caius also did, was the mingling of the Iudges: adding to the three hundred Senators, three hundred ROMAN knights to be indifferent Iudges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary manner were of opinion, that to reforme final faults, & to redresse them by lile and lile, was (as Plato sayd) to cut of one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards seven in the place; and therefore they tooke upon them a change and innovation, euen at once to roote out all the mischiefs of their contry, (or to speake more truly, to take away the disorder which brought in all vice and mischief to the common wealth) and so to restore the citie of SPARTA againe to her former aunient honorable estate. Nowe this may be said againe, for the gouernment of the GRACCHI: that the chiefe men of ROME were euer against their purposes. Where, in that that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, & that was the aunient lawes and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equalitie: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alterations of the first, ROME became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GREECE in short time sawe that SPARTA commaunded all the rest of PELOPONNESVS, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GREECE, for the signorie thereof. Whereby their onely mark & purpose was, to rid all GREECE from the warres of the GAVLES and ILLYRIANS, and to restore it againe to the honest gouernment of the race and lyne of Hercules. Their deathes, one thinks, doe thew great difference of their corages. For the GRACCHI fighting with their owne Citizens, were slaine flying. Of these two also, Agis, because he would put neuer a Citizen to death, was slaine in manner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiuing iniurie flood to his defence, and when he had no opportunitie to doe it, he slowly killed him selfe. And so may it be said on thother side, that Agis did neuer any noble acte of a Captaine or fauldrer, because he was slaine before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on thother side, may be opposed the scaling of the walls of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault got vp vpon the wall, which was no small exploit: and the peace which he made also at the sege of NVMANTIA, whereby he saued twenty thousand fighting men of the ROMANES, the which had no meanes otherwise to saue their liues. And Caius also in the selfe same warre, at the sege of NVMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feates of warre: so that there is no doubt, but if they had not bene slaine so soone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excellentest Captaines that euer were in ROME. Again, touching their doings in ciuill pollicie, it appeareth that Agis delt more slackly, being abused by Agellans: who likewise deceiued the poore Citizens of the diuision of the landes which he had promised them. In fine, for lacke of corage, because he was very young, he left the thinges vndone which he had purposed to haue performed. On thother side, Cleomenes went too rowndly to worke to renew the aunient gouernment of the common wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much crueltie, whom he might easily haue wonne, or otherwise by force haue gotten the vpper hand. For it is not the parte of a wise Philition, nor of a good gouernor of a common weale to vse the sword, but in great extremitie, where there is no other helpe nor remedie: & there lacked iudgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for iniury is euer ioyned with crueltie. The GRACCHI on thother side, neither the one nor the other, began to embrew their hands in the blood of their Citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would neuer defend him selfe: and where it was known that he was very valliant in battell with his sword in his hand against the enimie, he shewed him selfe as cold againe in the vprore against his Citizens. For he went out of his house vnarmed, and fled when he saw them fight: being more circumspect not to doe hurt, then not to suffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearefull to offend any man. For they were driuen, either to yeeld to them that followed them, or els if they stayed, to stande to their defence, because they might keepe them selues from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greatest that euer he did, was when he deposest Othanius his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he him selfe made sure for the second. And as for Caius, they falsely accused him for the death of Antyllus the Sergeaunt, who in deede was slaine vn-

known to him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on thother side, although we should A forget the murder he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he set slaues at libertie, and ruled the kingdom in manner him selfe alone: but yet for manners sake onely he ioyned his owne brother with him, which was of the selfe same house. And when he had perswaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdom of the other royall house) to be bold to returne home from Messena vnto Sparta: he suffered him to be slayne, and bicause he did not reuenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was consenting to his death. Lycorgus on the other side, whose example he did counterfeate to followe, bicause he did willingly resigne the kingdom vnto his brothers sonne Charilam, and being afraid also, that if the young child should chaunce to miscary, they would suspect him for his death: he exiled him selfe out of his owne contry a long time, trauellling vp and downe, and returned not to Sparta againe, B before Charilam had gotten a sonne to succede him in his kingdom. But we can not let another Græcian by Lycorgus comparable vnto him. We haue declared also that amongst Cleomenes deedes, there were many other greater alterations then these, and also many other breaches of the lawe. So they that doe condemne the manners of the one and the other, say, that the two Græcians from the beginning had an aspyring minde to be tyrannes, still practising warres. Whereas the two Romanes onely, euen by their most mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing els, but for an extreame ambition, and did confesse that they were too earnest and vehement aboute their nature, in any strife or contention they had with their aduersaries, and that they yelded vnto that choller and passion, as vnto ill windes, which brought them to doe those things they did in the ende. For what more iust or honest intent could they haue had, then the first was: had not the riche men (euen through stowmes and C authoritie to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them against their wills into quarrell: the one to saue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was slayne without order, iustice, or the authoritie of any officer? Thusthou maiest thy selfe see the difference, that was betwene the Græcians and Romanes: and now to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the stowtest of the foure, that the younge king Agis offended least, and that for boldnes and courage, Caius came nothing neare vnto Cleomenes.

Demosthenes.

HE that made the litle booke of the praise of Alcibiades, touching the vi-storie he wanne at the horse rase of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides as some thinke, or any other) my friende Sofista: sayde, that to make a man happy, he must of necessitie be borne in some famous citie. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, douteles, true happines chiefly consisteth in the vertue and qualities of the minde, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous citie: no more then it is for one to be borne of a fayer or fowle mother. For it were a madnes to thinke that the litle village of Ivlide, being the least part of the Ile of Ceo (the whole Iland of it selfe being but a small B thing) and that the Ile of Ægina (which is of so final a length, that a certaine Athenian on a time made a motion it might be taken away, bicause it was but as a strawe in the sight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comediants: and not breed an honest, iust, and wise man, and of noble corage. For, as we haue reason to thinke that artes and sciences which were first deuised and inuented to make some things necessary for mens vse, or otherwise to winne fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in litle poore villages: So are we to iudge also, that vertue, like a strong and frutefull plant, can take roote, and bringe forth in euery place, where it is grafted in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chaunce to offend, and liue not as we should: we can not accuse the meanenes of our contry where we were borne, but we must iustly accuse our C selues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put forth any worke, or to write any historie, into the which he is to thrust many straunge things vnknown to his contry, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but disperfed abroad in diuers places, and are to be gathered out of diuers bookes and authorities: first of all, he must needes remaine in some great and famous citie thoroughly inhabited, where men doe delight in good and vertuous things, bicause there are commonly plenty of all sortes of bookes: and that perusing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will cary so much more credit, bicause men that are aliue may presently speake of them as of their owne knowledge, whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery poynt, hauing many and diuers necessary things conteyned in it. But I my selfe that dwell in a poore litle towne, and yet doe remayne there willingly least it should become lesse: while I was in I T A L Y, and at R O M E, I had no lyeure to study and exercise the Latine tongue, aswell for the great busines I had then to doe, as also to satisfie them that came to learne Philosophie of me: so that euen somewhat too late, and now in my latter time, I began to take my Latine bookes in my hand. And thereby, a straunge thing tell you, but yet true: I learned not, nor vnderstood matters so much by the words, as I came to vnderstand the words, by common experience & knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to know howe to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to vnderstand the signification, translations, and fine ioyning of the simple words one with another, which doe bewtifie & set forth the tongue: surely I iudge it to be a maruailous pleasant and sweete thing, but withall it requirith a long and laborious study, meete for those that haue better lyeure then I haue, & that haue young yeares on their backs to follow such pleasure. Therefore, in this present booke, which is the list of this work, where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of noble men one with another: vnder-taking to write the liues of Demosthenes and Cicero, we will consider and examine their nature, manners and condicions, by their acts and deedes in the gouernment of the common wealth, not meaning otherwise to conferre their workes and writings of eloquence, nether to define which of them two was sharper or sweeter in his oration. For, as the Poet Ion sayth,

In this behalfe a man may rightly say,

The Dolphynes in their proper soyle doe play.

The which Cacilius lide vnderstanding, being a man very rashe in all his doings, hath vnadvisedly written and set forth in print, a comparison of Demosthenes eloquence, with Ciceroes. But if it were an easie matter for euery man to know him selfe, then the goddes needed haue giuen vs no commaundement, nether could men haue said that it came from heauen. But for my opiniõ, me thinks fortune euen from the beginning hath framed in manner one self mowld of Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures facioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as, both of them to be ambitious, both of them to loue the libertie of their contry, and both of them very feareful in any danger of warres. And likewise their fortunes seeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is harde to finde two Orators againe, that being so meanelly borne as they, haue comen to be of so great power and authoritie as they two, nor that haue defused the ill will of kings & noble men so much as they haue done, nor that haue lost their Daughters, nor that haue bene banished their contries, & that haue bene restored againe with honor, and that againe haue fled, and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their liues with the libertie of their cõtry. So that it is hard to be iudged, whether nature haue made them liker in manners, or fortune in their doings, as if they had both like cunning workemaiters strued one with the other, to whome they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was as Theopompus writeth, one of the chiefe men of the cite, and they called him Macharopæus, to wete, a maker of sworde blades, bicause he had a great shoppe where he kept a number of blades to forge them. But touching Æschines, the Orators report of his mother, who said that she was the Daughter of one Gelon (that fled from A T H E N S being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother: I am not able to say whether it be true, or deuised of malice to doe him despite. Howsoever it was, it is true that his father died, leauing him seuen yeare olde, and left him reasonable wel: for his goods came to litle lesse then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his gardians did him great wronge: for they stole a great parte of his goods then selues, and did let the rest runne to naught, as hauing litle care of it, for they would not pay his schoolemaisters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learne the liberal sciences which are usually taught vnto honest mens sonnes: and to further that want also, he was but a weakling, & very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him goe to schoole, nether his masters also durst keepe him too hard to it, bicause he was but a sickly childe at the first, and very weak. And it is reported also, that the surname of Battalus was giuen him in mockery by other schooleboyes his companions, bicause of his weaknes of body. This Battalus (as diuers men doe report) was an effeminate player on the flute, against whome the Poet Antiphanes do mocke Demosthenes why he was called Battalus.

A mocke him, deuised a litle play. Others also doe write of one Battalus, a dissolute Orator, and that wrote lasciuious verses: and it seemeth that the A T H E N I A N S at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argus (which surname men say was also giuen him) he was so called, either for his rude and beastly manners, (bicause some Poets doe call a snake Argus) or els for his manner of speech, which was very vnpleasant to the eare: for Argus is the name of a Poet, that made alwayes bawdy & ill fauored songs. But hereof enough as Plato said. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moued him to giue him selfe to eloquence, was this. Calistratus the Orator was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Iudges, and euery man longed greatly for this daye of pleading, both for the excellencie of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly knowen to all. Demosthenes hearing his schoolemasters agree together to goe to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his schoolemaster to be so good, as to let him goe with him. His Maister graunted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the halldore where this matter was to be pleaded, he so intreated them, that they placed his scholar in a very good place, where being set at his ease, he might both see and heare all that was done, and no man could see him. Thereupon, when Demosthenes had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he sawe howe he was wayted vpon home with such a trayne of people after him: but yet he wondred more at the force of his great eloquence, that could so turne and conuey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon he left the studie of all other sciences, and all other exercises of witte and bodye, which other children are brought vp in: and beganne to labor continually, and to frame him selfe to make orations, with intent one day to be an Orator amonge the rest. His Maister that taught him Rethoricke was Isæus, notwithstanding that Isocrates also kept a schoole of Rethoricke at that time: either bicause that being an orphan he was not able to paye the wages that Isocrates demanded of his schollers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he founde Isæus manner of speeche more proper for the vse of the eloquence he desired, bicause it was more finer, & subtler. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithstanding, that he had red certayne bookes, hauing no name of any author, which declared that Demosthenes had bene Platoes scholler, and that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronounciation and eloquence. And he writeth also of one Cresibius, who reporteth that Demosthenes had secretly redde Isocrates workes of Rethoricke, and also Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Calistus SYRACVSAN, and others.

Wherefore when he came out of his wardeshippe, he beganne to put his gardians in sure, and to write orations and pleas against them: who in contrary manner did euer vse delays and excuses, to saue them selues from giuing vp any accompt vnto him, of his goods and patrimony left him. And thus, following this exercise (as Thucydides writeth) it prospered so well with him, that in the ende he obtrayned it, but not without great paynes and daunger: and yet with all that he could doe, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So hauing now gotten some boldnes, and being vsed also to speake in open presence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading: afterwards he attempted to put forward him selfe, and to practise in matters of state. For, as there goeth a tale of one Laomedon an O R C H O M E N I A N, who hauing a grieuous paine in the spleene, by aduise of the Phisitions was willed to runne long courses to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end so lusty & nymble of body, that afterwards he would needes make one to runne for games, & in deede grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Euen so the like chaunced vnto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise oratorie for recouerie of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade: he afterwards tooke upon him to speake to the people in assemblies, touching the gouernment of the common wealth, euen as if he should haue contended for some game of price, & at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for orations: notwithstanding that when he first ventred to speake openly, the people made such a noyse, that he could scant be heard, and besides they mocked him for his manner of speeche that was so straunge, bicause he vsed so many long confused peryods, and his matter he spake of was so intricate with arguments one upon another, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very soft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had also a short breath, the which made that men could not well vnderstand what he ment, for his long periods in his oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the ende of his sentence. So that at length, perceiuing he was thus reiecte, he gaue ouer to speake any more before the people, and halfe in dispaire withdrew him selfe into the haue of Piræa. There Euonymus the THESSALIAN being a very olde man, founde him, and sharply reprovved him, and told him that he did him selfe great wronge, considering, that hauing a manner of speeche much like vnto Pericles, he drowned him selfe by his saynt harte, bicause he did not seeke the way to be bolde against the noyse of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burden of publike orations, but suffering it to growe feeble, for lacke of vse and practise. Furthermore, being once againe repulled and whistled at, as he returned home, hanging downe his heade for shame, and vterly discouraged: Satyrus an excellent player of comedies, being his famillier friende, followed him, and went and spake with him. Demosthenes made his complaynt vnto him, that where he had taken more paynes then all the Orators besides, and had almost euen worne him selfe to the bones with studie, yet he coule by no meanes deuise to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but by bye all day long, and Maryners that vnderstoode nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with orations: and on thother side that they made no accompt of him. Satyrus then answered him, thou sayest true Demosthenes, but care not for this, I will helpe it straight, and take away the cause of all this: so thou wilt but tell me without booke certain veries of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereupon Demosthenes presently rehearsed some vnto him, that came into his minde. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with such a pronounciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becoming the verses, that Demosthenes thought them cleane changed. Whereby perceiuing how much the action (to wete, the comely manner and gesture in his oration) doth giue grace and comelines in his pleading: he then thought it but a trifle, and almost nothing to speake of, to exercise to please well, vntil therewithall he doe also study to haue a good pronounciation and gesture. Thereupon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole euen in my time, & he would daily goe downe into it, to facion his gesture and pronounciation, and also to exercise his voice, and that with such earnest affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three monethes one after another, and did haue his heade of purpose, bicause he durst not goe abroad in that sorte, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declame upon, and to practise to please of the matters he had had in hande before, or els vpon occasion of such talke as he had with them that came to see him, while he kept his house. For they were no sooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed betwene him and his friendes in talke together, and alleaged also both his owne and their answers. And if peradventure he had bene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeat it by him selfe: and would finely cowche and conuey it into proper sentences, and thus chaunge and alter euery way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quicke capacite by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten with extreame labor. And for prooofe hereof, they make this probable reason, That they neuer sawe Demosthenes make any oration on the suddain, and that oftentimes when he was sette in the assemblee, the people would call him by his name, to say his opinion touching the matter of counsell then in hand: Howbeit that he neuer rose vpon their call, vnles he had first studied the matter well he would speake of. So that all the other Orators would many times giue him at awayne for it: as Pythias among others, that tawnting him on a tyme, tolde him, his reasons smelled of the lampe. Yea, replied Demosthenes sharply againe: so is there great difference, Pythias, betwixt thy labor and myne by lamplight. And him selfe also speaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told them plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length all that he would speake, nether did he also offer to speake, before he had made briefes of that he would speake. He sayd furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that he would be careful before what he would say to them. For this prepatiuie (q he) doth shewe that he

A doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary manner also, he that passeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he despiseth their authoritie, & that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vie force against them, rather then reason and perswasion. But yet further to enlarge the prooofes, that Demosthenes had no hart to make any oration on the suddain, they doe alleage this reason: that Demades many times rose vpon the sodaine to mainteine Demosthenes reasons, when the people otherwhile did reiect him: and that Demosthenes on thother side did neuer rise to make Demades words good, which he had spoken in his behaffe. But now might a man aske againe: if Demosthenes was so timorous to speake before the people vpon the sodaine: what ment Æschines then to say, that he was maruelous bold in his words. And how chaunceth it, that he rising vpon the sodaine, did presently answer the Orator Pythias BIZANTIENE in the field, that was very lusty in speech, (& rough like a vehement running streame) against the ATHENIANS. And how chaunced it that Lamachus MYRRINEIAN, hauing made an oration in the praise of Philip and Alexander, kings of MACEDON, in the which he spake all the ill he coule of the THEBANS, and of the OLYNTIANS, and when he had red and pronounced it in the open assembly of the Olympian games: Demosthenes upon the instant rising vpon his seene, declared, as if he had red some historie, & poynted as it were with his finger vnto all the whole assembly, the notable great seruice & worthy deedes the which the CHALCIDIANS had done in former times, for the benefit and honor of GREECE. And in contrary maner also, what michiel & inconuenience came by meanes of the flatterers, that altogether gaue them selues to curry fauor with the MACEDONIANS? With these and such like perswasions, Demosthenes made him selfe sturte amongst the people, that the Orator Lamachus being affraid of the sodaine vpror, did secretly conuey him selfe out of the assembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke, Demosthenes in my opinion facioning him selfe euen from the beginning, to followe Pericles steppes and example, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not so requisite for him, and that he would counterfeate his grauitie and sober countenance, and to be wise, not to speake ouer lightly to euery matter at all adventures: Iudging, that by that manner of wisdom he came to be great. And like as he would not let slippe any good occasion to speake, where it might be for his credit: so would he not likewise ouer rashely hazard his credit and reputation to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the sodaine without premeditation before, doe shewe more boldnes and courage, then those which he had written, and studied long before: if we may beleue the reports of Eratostratus, Demetrius PHALARIAN, and of the other comical Poets. For Eratostratus sayd, that he would be often caried away with choller and furie. Demetrius also sayth, that speaking one daye to the people, he swate a great othe in ryme, as if he had bene possessed with some diuine spirit, and sayd,

There are also certaine comical Poets that doe call him Ropoperperethra, as who would say, a great babler that speaketh all things that cometh to his tongues ende. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rhetorick called, Antitheton: which is, opposition, with saying, Sic recepit sicut cepit, (which significth, heooke it as he found it.) In the vife of this figure Demosthenes much pleased him selfe; vnles the poet Antiphanes speake it of pleasure, deriding the coisell he gaue the people, not to take the Ile of HALONESVS of king Philip, as of gift: but to receiue it as their owne restored. And yet euery body did graunt, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without arte, was inuincible: and that many times speaking vpon the sodaine, he did vterly overthrow Demosthenes long studied reasons. And Aristo, of the Ile of CHIO, hath written Theophrastus iudgement of the Orators of that time. VVho being asked what manner of Orator he thought Demosthenes: he answered, worthy of this cite. Then again, how he thought of Demades: about this cite, said he. The same Philosopher writeth also, that Polyenctus SPHETTIAN, (one of those that practised at that time in the common wealth) gaue this sentence: that Demosthenes in dedee was a great Orator, but Phocion's tongue had a sharper vnderstanding, bicause in fewe wordes, he comprehended much matter. And to this purpose, they say that Demosthenes him selfe said also, that as oft as he saw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for orations to speake against him, he was wont to say to his friends: see, the axe of my words nifeth. And yet it is hard to iudge, whether he ſpoke that in reſpect of his tongue, or rather for the eſtimation he had gotten, becauſe of his great wiſedome: thinking (as in deeде it is true) that one word only, the twinkling of an eye, or a nod of his head of ſuch a man (that through his worthines is attained to that credit) hath more force to perſwade, then all the fine reaſons & deuifes of Rhetorick. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that he heard Demosthenes him ſelfe ſay, being very olde, that he did helpe them by theſe meanes. Firſt, touching the ſammering of his tongue, which was very far, and made him that he could not pronounce all ſyllables diſtinctly: he did helpe it by putting of litle pybble ſtones into his mouth, which he found vpon the ſands by the riuers ſide, & ſo pronounced with open mouth the orations he had without booke. And for his ſmal and ſoft voice, he made that lower, by running vp ſteepe and high hills, vtering euen with full breath ſome orations or verſes that he had without booke. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking glaſſe in his houſe, and euer ſtanding on his ſeete before it, he would learne and exerciſe him ſelfe to pronounce his orations. For prooſe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, and prayed his helpe to defend his cauſe, and tolde him that one had beaten him: and that Demosthenes ſayd agayne vnto him, I doe not beleue this is true thou telleſt me, for ſurely the other did neuer beate thee. The playntif then thruſting out his voyce alowde, ſayde: what, hath he not beaten me? yes, in deeде, & Demosthenes then: I beleue it now, for I heare the voyce of a man that was beaten in deeде. Thus he thought, that the found of the voyce, the pronunciation or geſture in one ſort or other, were thinges of force to beleue or diſcredit that a man ſayth. His countenance when he pleaded before the people, did maruailouſly C pleaſe the common ſorte: but the noble men, and men of vnderſtanding, found it too baſe and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius ſayde, amonge others. And Hermippus writeth, that one called Aeſion, being asked of the ancient Orators, and of thoſe of his tyme, answered: that euery man that had ſeene them, would haue wondred with what honor, reuerence, and modeſtie, they ſpoke vnto the people: howbeit that Demosthenes orations (whoſe other red them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eaſily iudge, that the orations Demosthenes wrote are very ſeuere and ſharpe. This notwithstanding, otherwhile he would giue many pleaſant and witty anſwers apon the ſodain. As when Demades one day ſayd vnto him, Demosthenes will teach me: after the common prouerbe, the ſowe will teach Minerva. He answered ſtraight againe: This Minerva not long ſince, was in Collytus ſtreete, taken in adulterie. A certain theefe alſo called Chaleus (as much to ſay, as of copper) ſtepping forth to ſaye ſomewhat of Demosthenes late ſitting vp a nights, and that he wrote and ſtuded the moſt part of the night by lampe light: in deeде, & Demosthenes, I know it grieues thee to ſee my lampe burne all night. And therefore, you, my Lordes of ATHENS, me thinkes you ſhould not wonder to ſee ſuch robberies in your citie, conſidering we haue theeuſes of copper, and the wallſes of our houſes be but of claye. We could tell you of diuers others of his like writte and pleaſant anſwers, but theſe may ſuffice for this preſent: and therefore we will proceede to conſider further of his nature and conditions; by his actes and deedes in the affaires of the common wealth. Now Demosthenes firſt beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, was in the time of the warre made with the PHOCIANS, as him ſelfe reporteth: and as appeareth E further in his orations which he made againſt Philip: of the which, the laſt were made after the warre was ended, & the firſt doe touch alſo ſome particuler doings of the ſame. He made the oration againſt Midias, when he was but 32. yeare old, and was of ſmall countenance & reputation in the common wealth: the want whereof was the chiefſt cauſe (as I thinke) that induced him to take money for the injury he had done him, & to let his action fall againſt him.

He was not of a meeke and gentle mind,

But ſeuer and haſty to reuenge by kind.

But, knowing that it was no ſmall enterpriſe, nor that could take effect by a man of ſo ſmall power & authoritie as him ſelfe, to ouerthrow a man ſo wealthy, ſo befriended, & ſo eloquent as Midias: he therefore yielded him ſelfe vnto thoſe, that did ſpeake & intreate for him. Neither do I think that the three thouſand Drachmas which he receiued, could haue bridled the bitternes of his nature, if otherwiſe he had ſeene any hope or likelihood that he could haue pre-ailed againſt him. Now at his firſt coming vnto the common wealth, taking a noble matter in hid to ſpeak againſt Philip, for the defence & maintenance of the lawes & liberties of the GREECIANS, wherein he handled him ſelfe worthely: that in ſhort ſpace he wanne him maruelous fame for his great eloquence and plaine manner of ſpeech. Thereby he was maruelouſly honored alſo through all GREECE, and greatly eſteemed with the king of PERSIA: and Philip him ſelfe made more accompt of him, then of all the Orators in ATHENS, & his greateſt foes which were moſt againſt him, were driuen to confeſſe that they had to doe with a famous man. For, in the orations which Aeſchines & Hyperides made to accuſe him, they write thus of him. And therefore I maruell what Theopompus ment, when he wrote that Demosthenes had a ſturtell, vnconſtant mind, & could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters B of ſtate. For in contrary manner, in my iudgement, he continued conſtant ſtill to the end, in one ſelfe maner & order, vnto the which he had betaken him ſelfe at the beginning: & that not onely he neuer changed all his life time, but to the contrary he loſt his life, becauſe he would be no chaungeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuſe him ſelfe for that he had oft turned coate in matters of gouernment, ſaid, that he went oftentimes againſt his own ſayings, as matters ſel out but neuer againſt the benefit of the common wealth. And Aelanus alſo, who was euer againſt Callistratus, hauing his mouth ſtopped many times with money, he would vp to the pulpit for orations, & tel the people, that in deeде Callistratus, which maintaineth the contrary opinion againſt me, is mine enemy, & yet I yeld vnto him for this time: for the benefit of the common wealth muſt cary it. And another alſo, Nicomachus Meſſenian, who being firſt of C Cassanders ſide, toke part afterwards with Demetrius, & then ſaid, that he did not ſpeake againſt him ſelfe, but that it was meeete he ſhould obey his ſuperiors. They can not detect Demosthenes with the like, that he did euer halt or yeld, either in word or deeде: For he euer continued firme and conſtant in one mind in his orations. Inſomuch that Panetius the Philoſopher ſayth, that the moſt part of all his orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it ſelfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honeſt. As the oration of the crowne, the which he made againſt Aristocrates: that alſo which he made for the franchises and freedom: and in fine, all his orations againſt Philip of MACEDON. And in all thoſe he doth not perſwade his contry men to take that which is moſt pleaſant, eaſieſt, or moſt profitable: but he proueth that oftentimes honeſtie is to be preferred aboue ſaſetie or health. So that, had he in D all his orations and doings, ioyned to his honeſtie, curteſie, and francke ſpeeche, valliantnes in warres, and cleane hands from bribery: he might deſeruedly haue bene compared, not with Myrocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides: and ſuch other Orators: but euen with the higheſt, with Cimon, Thucydides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worſt way in gouernment of the common wealth, becauſe he was ſuſpected that he tooke part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valliantnes, wiſedome and iuſtice, he was euer thought as honeſt a man, as Ephialtes, and Aristides. But Demosthenes on thother ſide (as Demetrius layth) was no man to truſt to for warres, neither had he any power to reſuſe gifts and bribes. For, though he would neuer be corrupted with Philip king of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with gold and ſiluer that was brought from the cities of SYRIA & EGYPTANA, & was very ready to praife & commend the deedes of their anceſtors, E but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honeſteſt man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And beſides, he did euer ſpeake more boldly and plainly to the people then any man els, and would openly contrary their mindes, and ſharply reprove the ATHENIANS for their faultes, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus alſo writeth, that the people on a time would haue had him to accuſe a man, whome they would needes haue condemned. But he reſuſing to doe it, the people were offended, and did mutine againſt him. Thereupon he riſing vp, ſayd openly vnto them: my Lordes ATHENIANS, I will alwayes counſell ye to that which I thinke beſt for the benefit of the common wealth, although it be againſt your mindes: but fallſely to accuſe one, to ſaſiſie your mindes, though you commaund me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did againſt Aniſiphon, ſheweth plainly that he was no people F pleaſer, and that he did leane more vnto the authoritie of the Senate. For when Aniſiphon was quit by the people in an aſſembly of the citie: Demosthenes notwithstanding tooke him, & called him againe into the Court of the Areopagites, and did not paſſe vpon the peoples ill will, but there convinced him for promising Philip of Macedon to burne the arsenal of Athenians A so by sentence of that court he was condemned, & suffered for it. He did also accuse the Nunne Theorides for many lewd parts committed, & amongst others, for that she taught flaures to deceive their maisters: & so following the matter against her to death, she was condemned, and executed. It is thought also, that he made the oration Apolodorus spake against the Prator Ti- motheus, & proued thereby that he was a detter to the common wealth, & so a naughty man: & that he wrote those orations also intituled vnto Formio and Stephanus, for the which he was in-iustly reprocured. For Formio pleaded against Apolodorus with the oration which Demosthenes selfe had made for him: which was euen alike, as if out of one selfe cutlers shoppe; he had solde his enemies swords one to kil another. And for his known orations, those which he made against Androtion, Timocrates, and Aristocrates: he caused them to giue them vnto others, when he had not yet delc in matters of state. For in deede when he did put them forth, he was not passing feuen or eight and twenty yeare olde. The oration which he made against Aristogiton, and the other also of libertie, against Ctesippus the sonne of Cabrias, he spake them, as he saith him selfe, (or as others write) openly vnto the people, because he intended to marry Chabrias mother.

 Howbeit he did not, but married a SAMIAN womā, as Demetrius Magnus writeth in his booke he made intituled Synonyma, and in that he wrote against Aeschines: where he accuseth him that he delc falsly when he was Ambassador. It is not known whether it was euer recited or not, although Idomenus writeth, that there lacked but thirry voices onely to haue quit Aes- chines. But in this me thinks he spake not truly, and doth but coniecture it, by that the one & the other haue sayd in their orations against the crowne, in the which, neither the one nor the other doe say precisely, that this accusation proceeded to iudgement. But let other that lyst decide this doubt. Now before the warre began, it was euident enough, to which parte De- mosthenes would incline in the common wealth: For he would neuer leaue to reprove and withstand Philippes doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Philippes Court, then any man els, he was sent vnto him the tenth perfon with nyne others in ambassade. Philippe gaue them all audience one after another: howbeit he was more carefull and circumspect to aunswer Demosthenes oration, then all the rest. But otherwise out of that place, he did not De- mosthenes so much honor, nor gaue him so good entertainment, as to his other companions. For Philipp thewed more kindness, and gaue better countenance vnto Aeschines, and Philocrates, then vnto him. Wherefore when they did highly praise Philip, and sayd that he was a well spoken D Prince, a fayrer man, and would drinke freely, and be pleasant in company: Demosthenes symled at it, and turned all those thinges to the worst, saying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For the first was a qualitie meete for a pleader, the second for a woman, and the third for a sponge. In fine, warres falling out betwene them, because Phi- lip of the one side could not liue in peace, & the ATHENIANS on the other side were stil incensed & stirred vp by Demosthenes daily orations. Whereupon, the ATHENIANS first sent into the Ile of Euboea, (the which by meanes of certaine priuate tyrannes that had taken the townes, became subiect againe vnto Philip following a decree Demosthenes had preferred, & so went to expulſe the MACEDONIANS againe. After that also he caused them to send ayde vnto the BI- ZANTIANS, & vnto the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made warre. For he so perswaded the E ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto those two nations, & the faults which either of both the cities had committed against them in the warres, touching the rebellion of their confederats: & he caused them to send them ayde, which kept them frō Philips force & power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto all the great cities of GREECE as Ambassador, he did so sollicit & perswade them, that he brought them all in manner to be against Philip. So that the army which their tribe should find at their common charge, was fifteene thousand footemen, all straungers, and two thousand horsemen, besides the Citizens of euery citie which should also serue in the warres at their charge: and the money leaued for the maintenance of this warre, was very willingly disbursed. Theophrastus writeth, that it was at that tyme their confederats did pray that they would set downe a certaine summe F of money, what euery citie shoulde paye: and that Crobylus an Orator shoulde make aunswer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was

A infinite. Now all GREECE being in armes, attending what should happen, and all these people and cities being vnite in one league together: as, the EVBOIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CO- RIINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEVCADEANS, and the GOROYRIANS the greatest matter Demosthenes had to do, was to perswade the THEBANS also to enter into this league, because their contry confined and bordered with ATTICA, besides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all GREECE at that time, for the valliantest fouldi-ers. But it was no trifling matter to winne the THEBANS, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them, in the warre of the PHOCIANS: besides also that betwike ATHENS & THEBES, by reason of vicinitie, there fell out daily quarels and debates, the which with euery litle thing were B soone renewed. This notwithstanding, Philipp being proude of the victorie he had wonne by the citie of AMPHISSE, when he came and invaded the contry of ELATIA, and was entred into PHOCIDE: the ATHENIANS were then so amased with it, that no man durst occupie the pulpit for orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole assemblie standing in a doubt with great silence, Demosthenes onely steppe vp, and did agayne giue them counsell to seeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and so did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwayes wont to doe. Then with others he was sent Ambassador vnto THEBES: and Philipp also for his parte, sent Ambassadors vnto the THEBANS, Amyntas and Clearchus, two gentlemen MACEDONIANS, and with them, Dio- chus, Thestylus, and Thrasidamus, to aunſwer and withstand the perswasions of the ATHENIAN C Ambassadors. Thereupon the THEBANS beganne to aduise them selues for the best, and layd before their eyes the miserable frutes and calamities of warre, their woundes being yet greene, and vnured, which they gotte by the warres of PHOCIDE. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demosthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did so inflame the THEBANS courage with desire of honor, that it rode vnder their feete all manner of considerations, and did so raise them with the loue and desire of honestie: that they cast at their heeles, all feare of daunger, all remembrance of pleasures receiued, and all reason perswading the contrary. This acte of an Orator was of so great force, that Philipp forthwith sent Ambassadors vnto the GRECI- ANS, to intreate for peace, and all GREECE was vppe, to see what would become of this sturte.
 Thus, not onely the Captaines of ATHENS obeyed Demosthenes, doing all that he commaun-D ded them: but the gouernors also of THEBES, and of all the contry of BOEOTIA besides. And the assemblies also of the counsell of THEBES were as well gouerned by him, as the assemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, and hauing a like authoritie to commaund both, and not vndeferredly, as Theopompus sayth, but by iust desert. But some fatall destinie, and the reuolucion of times had determined the finall ende of the libertie of GREECE at that time, cleane contrary to his purpose and intent. There were also many celestiall signes that did foreshewe and prognosticate what ende should ensue thereof. And amongst others, Apolloer Nunne gaue these dreadful oracles: and this olde prophecie of the SIBYLS was commonly song in euery bodys mouth.

VVhat time the bloody battell shall be fought at Thermodon, God graunt I may be farre away, or els (to looke thereon) Haue Eagles vying to soare above, among the clowdes on hye.
 For there the vanquish side shall weepe, and Conquerer shall dye.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle riuer of our contry of CHERONIA, the which falleth into the riuer of Cephissus: howbeit at this present time there is neuer a riuer nor brook in all our contry, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that riuer which we call now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Hæmules, where the GRECIANS lay in campe. And it maybe, that because it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloud at the day of the battell, it chaunged her name, & was sunamed Hæmon, because Hæma in the Greeke tongue, signifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding, that this Thermodon was no riuer, but that certaine men setting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of stone, whereupon were engrauen these letters, whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an AMAZON hart in his armes, & that for this image of Themodon, they do bring such another olde oracle as this:

Ye Ernes and Ravens taryll the field of Themodon:
There will be store of Carcasses of men to feede vpon.

This notwithstanding, it is very hard to tell the mothe of these things. But Demosthenes trusting to the valliantes and power of the Grecians, and being maruelously incouraged to see such a great number of valliant & resolute me, so willing to fight with the enemy: he bad them be of good corage, & not to baste about such oracles, & to giue care to those prophecies. And furthermore, he told them plainly, that he did mistrust the Nunne Pythia did leane vnto Philip, as fauoring him, & did put the Thebians in mind of their Capitaine Epaminondas, & the Athenians of Pericles, & perswaded them, that those two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that such prophecies were no other, but a fine cloke for cowards, & that taking no heede to them, they did dispatch their matters according to their owne discretion. Vntill this present time, Demosthenes shewed him selfe alwaies an honest man: But when it came to the battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valliant acte any thing answerable to the orations whereby he had perswaded the people. For he left his ranc, & cowardly cast away his weapons to runne the lighter, & was not alhamed at all, as Pythias said, of the words written vpon his shield in golden letters, which were, Good Fortune. Now Philip hauing wonne the battell, he was at that present so ioyfull, that he fell to committ many fond parts. For after he had droncke well with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, & there in mockery began to sing the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had preferred, (by the which, the Athenians accordingly proclaimed warres against him) rising and falling with his voyce, and dauncing in C

Demosthenes, the some of Demosthenes Paeanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to waxe sober, & leauing his dronkenness, & that he had remembred him selfe what danger he had bene in: then his heare stood bolt upright vpon his head, considering the force & power of such an Orator, that in a peece of a day had inforced him to hazard his Realme & life at a battell. Now Demosthenes fame was so great, that it was caried euen to the great king of Persias court, who wrote vnto his Lieutenants & gouernors, that they should feede Demosthenes with money, & should procure to entertaine him aboute all the men in Greece, as he that could best withdraw Philip, & trouble him with the warres and tumults of Greece. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demosthenes him selfe, D the which came to king Alexanders hands in the cite of Sardis, and by other writings also of the gouernors & Lieutenants of the king of Persia: in the which were named directly the expresse sommes of money which had bene sent & giuen vnto him. Now, the Grecians being thus ouerthrowen by battell, the other Orators, aduerfaries vnto Demosthenes in the common wealth, began to set upon him, & to prepare to accuse him. But the people did not only cleere him of all the accusations obiected against him, but did continue to honor him more then before, & to call him to assemblies, as one that loued the honor and benefit of his contry. So that when the bones of their contry men which were slayne at the battell of Cheronnea, were brought to be openly buried according to the custom: the people gaue him the honor to make the funeral oration in praise of the dead, & made no shew of sorow or griefe for the losse E they had receiued: (as Theopompus witnesseth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary manner shewed that they did not repent them in following of his counsell, but did honor him that gaue it. Demosthenes then did make the funeral oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would neuer subscribe any, to preuent the sinister lucke & misfortune of his name, but did passe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew coragious againe, shortly after that he vnderboode of the death of Philip, who was slaine immediately after the victorie he wanne at Cheronnea. And it seemeth this was the meaning of the prophetic or oracle in the two last verses:

The vanquished be voyles his lucklesse lot, And he that vwinnes, with life elsapeth not.

Now Demosthenes hearing of *Philip*s death, before the newes were openly known, to preuent them, he would put the people again into a good hope of better lucke to come. Ther eupon he went

A wet with a cheerfull countenance into the assembly of the counsell, & told them there, that he had had a certain dreame that promised great good hap, & that out of had vnto the Athenians: & immediately after, the messengers arriued that brought certain newes of king *Philip*s death. Thereupon the Athenians made sacrifices of ioy to the goddesses for this happie newes, and appointed a crowne vnto Pausanias that had slaine him. Demosthenes also came abroad in his best gowne, and crowned with flowers, seuen dayes after the death of his daughter, as Aeschines reporteth: who reproareth him for it, and noteth him to be a man hauing life loue or charitie vnto his owne children. But in deede Aeschines selfe deserueth more blame, to haue such a tender womanish hart, as to beleue, that weeping, and lamenting, are signes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and constancie doe passe away B such misfortunes. But now to the Athenians againe. I can neither thinke nor say that they did wisely to shew such open signes of ioy, as to weare crownes & garlands vpon their heads, nor also to sacrifice to the goddesses for the death of a Prince, that behaued him selfe so Princely and courteously vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For, though in dede all cruelty be subiect to the reuenge of the goddesses, yet is this an act of a vile and base minde, to honor a man, and while he liued to make him free of their cite, & now that an other hath slaine him, they to be in such an exceeding iolittie withall, and to exceede the bondes of modestie so farre, as to rampe in manner with both their feete vpon the dead, and to sing songs of victorie, as if they them selues had bene the men that had valliantly slaine him. In contrarie manner also, I praise and commend the constancie and corage of Demosthenes, that he leauing the reares and C lamentation of his home trouble vnto women, did him selfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefite of the common wealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of corage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a common wealth, neuer to stowpe nor yeeld, but alwayes to be found stable and constant, for the benefite of the common wealth, reiecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the seruice of his contrie, and to keepe his honor much more carefully, then common players vse to doe, when they play the partes of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weepe nor laugh when they list, though they be on the stage: but when the matter of the play falleth out to geue them iust occasion. But omitting those reasons, if there be no reason (as in deede there is not) to leaue and forsake a man in his sorow and trouble, without geuing him some wordes of comfort, and rather to deuise some D matter to assuage his sorow, and to withdraw his minde from that, to thinke vpon some pleasanter things: euen as they should keepe fore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene & darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles & grieues at home, when the common wealth doth well: then to ioyne their priuate grieues with common ioyes, to the end, that the better may obscure & take away the worle? But thus farre I digressed from my historie, enlarging this matter, because Aeschines in his Oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples hartes too much to womanish sorow. But now to the rest. The cities of Greece being againe stirred vp by Demosthenes, made a new league againe together: and the Thebians also hauing armed them selues by his practise, did one day set vpon the garrison of the Macedonians within their city, and slue many of them. E The Athenians prepared also to maintaine warre on the Thebians behalfe and Demosthenes was dayly at all the assemblies of counsell, in the pulpit, perswading the people with his Oration: and he wrote also into Asia vnto the king of Persias Lieutenants and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their side, calling him child, and Margites, as much to say, as foole. But after that Alexander hauing set all his things at stay within his realme, came him selfe in perlon with his armie, and inuaded the contrie of Borotia: then fell the pride of the Athenians greatly, & Demosthenes also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length, the poore Thebians being left vnto them selues, forsaken of euerie man: they were compelled them selues alone to beare the brunte of this warre, & so came their city to vter ruine and destruction. Thereby the Athenians being in a marcelous feare and perplexitie, did fadainly choose Ambassadors to send vnto this young king, and Demosthenes chiefly among others: F who being affrayed of Alexanders furie and wrath, durst not goe to him, but returned from mount Cytheron, and gaue vp the Ambassade. But Alexander sent to summe the Athenians

Alexander required certain Orators of Athens. Demosthenes tale of the sheepe and woulues.

N I A N S, to send vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both doe write: or eight, A as the most writers and best historiographers doe reporte, which were these: Demosthenes, Polycritus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Calisthenes, and Charidemus. At which time, they wryte that Demosthenes told the people of A T H E N S, the fable of the sheepe and woulues, how that the woulues came on a time, and willed the sheepe, if they woulde haue peace with them, to deliuer them their massiues that kept them. And so he compared him selfe, and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the contrie, vnto the dogges that kepe the flocks of sheepe, and calling Alexander the woulfe. And so forth, sayd he, like as you see these come maisters bringing a fample of their come in a dish or napkin to shew you, and by that lide doe sell all that they haue: so I thinke you will all wonder, that deliuering of vs, you will also deliuer your selues into the handes of your enemies. Aristobolus of C A S S A N D R A reporteth this matter thus. Now the A T H E N I A N S being in consultation, not knowing how to resolue: Demades hauing taken five talents of them whom Alexander demaunded, did offer him selfe, and promised to goe in this Ambassade vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them, either bicause he trusted in the loue the king did beare him, or else for that he thought he hoped he should finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the blood of beastes which he had slaine. Howsoeuer it happened, he perswaded the people to send him vnto him, and so handled Alexander, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the citie of A T H E N S. Thereupon Alexander being retyred, Demades and his fellows bare all the sway and authoritie, and Demosthenes was vnder foote. In deede when Agis king of L A C E D E M O N, came with his armie into the field, he began a lide to rowse him selfe, and to lift vp his head: but he shrunke choller againe C soone after, bicause the A T H E N I A N S woulde not rise with the L A C E D E M O N I A N S, who were ouerthrowen, and Agis slaine in battell. At that time was the cause of the crowne pleaded against Ctesiphon, and the plea was written a lide before the battell of C H E R O N E A, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouost of A T H E N S: howbeit no sentence was giuen but ten yerres after that Aristophan was Prouost. This was such an open iudgement, and so famous, as neuer was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as also for the worthines of the Iudges that gaue sentence thereof: who did not leaue Demosthenes to his enemies, although in deede they were of greater power then he, and were also supported with the fauor and good will of the M A C E D O N I A N S: but they did notwithstanding so well quit him, that AEschines had not so muche as the list parte of mens voyces and opinions D in his behalfe. Wherefore immediately after sentence geuen, he went out of A T H E N S for shame, and trauelled into the contrie of I O N I A, and vnto the R H O D E S, where he did teache Rethoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders seruice, came vnto A T H E N S, being to be charged with many fowle matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigality: and also bicause he feared Alexanders furie, who was grown seuerer and cruel, vnto his chiefeft seruantes. He comming now amongst the A T H E N I A N S, with store of gold and siluer, the Orators being greedie and desirous of the golde and siluer he had brought: beganne straight to speake for him, and did counsell the people to receiue & protect a poore suter that came to them for succour. But Demosthenes gaue counsell to the contrarie, and bad them rather driue him out of the citie, and take heed they brought not warres upon their backs, for E a matter that not onely was not necessarie, but furthermore meere vniust. But within fewe daies after, inuently being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiving that Demosthenes tooke great pleasure to see a cuppe of the kings, and considered verie curiously the facion & workmanhippe vpon it: he gaue it him in his hand, to iudge what it weyed. Demosthenes peasing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was so heauie: so he asked how many pound weight it weyed. Harpalus smiling, answered him: it will wey three twentie talents. So when night was come, he sent him the cuppe, with the twentie talents. This Harpalus was a verie wise man, and found straight by Demosthenes countenance that he loued money, and could presently iudge his nature, by seeing his pleasaunt countenance, and his eyes still vpon the cuppe. So Demosthenes refused not his gift, and being ouercomen withall, as if he had receiued a garri- son into his house, he tooke Harpalus parte. The next morning, he went into the assemblie of the people, hauing his necke bound vp with wolfe and rolles. So when they called him by his Harpalus a great money man came to Athens, flying from Alexander.

Demosthenes bribed by Harpalus with twenty talents.

A his name to steppe vp into the pulpit to speake to the people as he had done before he made a signe with his head, that he had an impediment in his voyce, & that he could not speake. But while men laughing at his fine excuse, tolde him it was no finanche that had stopped his witt that night, as he would make them beleue: but it was Harpalus argenty synache which he had receiued, that made him in that case. Afterwards when the people vnderstoode that he was corrupted, Demosthenes going about to excuse him selfe, they would not abide to heare him: but made a noyle and exclamacion against him. Thereupon there rose vp a pleasaunt conceited man, that sayd: why my maisters, do ye refuse to heare a man that hath * such a golden tongue? The people thereupon did immediatly banishe Harpalus, and searing least king Alexander would require an accompt of the gold and siluer which the Orators had robbed and pilfered away among them: they made very diligent searche and inquire in euery mans house, excepting Callicles house, the sonne of Arrenidas, whose house they would haue searched by no means, bicause he was but newly married, and had his newespowle in his house, as Theopompus wryteth. Nowe Demosthenes desiring to shewe that he was in fault, preferred a decree, that the court of the Areopagites should heare the matter, and punish them that were found faultie, and therewithall straight offered him selfe to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the first whom the court condemned in the summe of fiftie talents, and for lacke of payment, they put him in prison: where he could not endure long, both for the shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his sickely body. So he brake prison, partly without the priuie- tie of his keepers, and partly also with their consent: for they were willing he should make a C scape. Some doe report that he fled not farre from the citie: where it was told him that certaine of his enemies followed him, whereupon he would haue hidden him selfe from them. But they them selues first called him by his name, and comming to him, prayed him to take money of them, which they had brought him from their houses to helpe him in his banishment: and that therefore they ran after him. Ther: they did comfort him the best they could, & perswaded him to be of good cheere, & not to dispaire for the misfortune that was comen vnto him. This did pearce his hart the more for forow, that he answered them: why, would you not haue me beforie for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forsake the citie where in deede I haue so curteous enemies, that it is hard for me to finde any where so good frends: So he tooke his banishment vmanly, and remained the most parte of his banishment in the citie of A G I N A, or at the citie of T R O E Z E N, where oftentimes he would cast his eyes towards the contrie of A T T I C A, and weepe bitterly. And some haue written certaine words he spake, which shewed no minde of a man of corage, nor were aunswerable to the noble things he was wont to perfwade in his Orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of A T H E N S, he looked backe againe, and holding vp his handes to the castell, sayd in this sorte: O Ladie Minerva, Ladie patronesse of this city: why dost thou delight in three so mischieuous beastes: the owle, the draggon, and the people? Besides, he perswaded the young men that came to see him, and that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of state, assuring them, that if they had offered him two wayes at the first, the one to goe into the assembly of the people, to make Orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death presently, and that he had known as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to suffer that medleth with the affaires of the state, the feare, the enuie, the accusations, and troubles in the fame: he would rather haue chofen the way to haue suffered death. So, Demosthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander dyed, and all G R E C E was vp againe: insonmuch as Leofthenes being a man of great valure, had shur vp Antipater in the citie of L A M B A, and there kept him straightly besieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedes, surnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them banished from A T H E N S, they tooke parte with Antipater, and went from towne to towne with his Ambassadors and frendes, perswading the G R E C I A N S not to sturre, neither to take parte with the A T H E N I A N S. But Demosthenes in contrarie maner, ioyning with the Ambassadors sent from A T H E N S into euerie quarter, to sollicite the cities of G R E C E, to seeke to recouer F their libertie: he did aide them the best he could, to sollicite the G R E C I A N S, to take armes with the A T H E N I A N S, to driue the M A C E D O N I A N S out of G R E C E. And Phylarchus wryteth, that Demosthenes encountered with Pytheas wordes in an open assemblie of the people in a certaine towne of ARCADIA. Pytheas hauing spoken before him, had said: like as we presume alwaies that there is some sicknesse in the house whether we doe see asses milke brought: so must that towne of necessitie be sicke, wherein the Ambassadors of ATHENS doe enter. Demosthenes answered him againe, turning his comparison against him: that in dedde they brought asses milke, where there was neede to recouer health: and euen so, the Ambassadors of ATHENS were sent, to heale and cure them that were sicke. The people at ATHENS vnderstanding what Demosthenes had done, they so reioycied at it, that presently they gaue order in the field, that his banishment should be reuoked. He that perswaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Damon, PEANIAN, that was his nephew: and thereupon the ATHENIANS sent him a galley to bring him to ATHENS, from the city of ÆGINA. So Demosthenes being arriued at the haue of Piræa, there was neither Gouernour, Priest, nor almost any towne's man left in the city, but went out to the haue to welcome him home. So that Demetrius MAGNESIAN wryteth, that Demosthenes then lifting vp his handes vnto heauen sayed, that he thought him selfe happie for the honor of that iorney, that the returne from his banishment was farre more honorable, then Alcibiades returne in the like case had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: & he was sent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwithstanding, he remained still condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people could not dispence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuised a way to deceiue the lawe: for they had a manner to geue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and sette out the altuer of Iupiter fauor, for the day of the solemnitie of the sacrifice, the which they did yearly celebrate vnto him: so they gaue him the charge to make this preparation for the summe of fifty talents being the summe of the fine aforesayd wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good happe of his restitution to his contry and goodes. For the affaires of the GRECIANS were immediately after brought to vter ruine. For the battell of Crannon which they lost, was in the moneth Munichyon (to wit, Julie) and in the moneth Boedromion next ensuing, (to wit, August) the garrison of the MACEDONIANS entred into the forte of Munichya. And in the moneth Pynepson (to wit, the October following) Demosthenes died in this manner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were coming thither with a great armie, Demosthenes and his friends got out of the towne a litle before they entred, the people, by Demades perswasion, hauing condemned them to dye. So, euery man making thurst for him selfe, Antipater sent souldiers after them to take them: and of them Archias was Captaine, furnished Phygadothetas, as muche to say, as a hunter of the banished men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the citie of THYRIAS, and that he had bene sometimes a common player of tragedies: and that Polus also who was borne in the citie of ÆGINES, (the excellentest crafter maister in that facultie of all men) was his scholler. Yet Hermippus doth recite him amongst the number of the schollers of Lacritus the Orator. And Demetrius also wryteth, that he had bene at Anaximenes schoole. Now, this Archias hauing founde the Orator Hyperides in the citie of ÆGINA, Aristoniscus MARATHONIAN, and Himeræus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken sanctuary in the temple of Aiax: he tooke them out of the temple by force, and sent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the citie of CLÉONES, where he did put them all to death: and some say, that he did cut of Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demosthenes had taken sanctuary in the Ile of CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnasses, and a certaine number of THRACIAN souldiers, & being comen thither, he sought to perswade Demosthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promising him that he should haue no hurt. Demosthenes had a straunge dreame the night before, and thought that he had played a tragedie contending with Archias, and that he handled him selfe so well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commend him, and gaue him the honor to be the best player: howbeit that otherwise, he was not so well furnished, as Archias and his players, and that in all manner of furniture he did farre exceede him. The next morning when Archias came to speake with him, who vsing gentle wordes vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by fayer meanes to leaue the sanctuary: Demosthenes looking him full in the face, sitting still where he was, without remouing, sayd vnto him: O Archias, thou diddest neuer perswade me when thou playedst a play, neither shalt thou now perswade me, though

A though thou promise me. Then Archias began to be angrie with him, and to threaten him. O, sayd Demosthenes, now thou speakest in good earnest, without dissimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commanded thee: for before, thou spakest in the cloudes, and farre from thy thought. But I pray thee stay a while, till I haue written somewhat to my frendes. After he had sayd so, he went into the temple as though he would haue dispatched some letters, and did put the ende of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his manner was when he did vse to write any thing, and held the ende of the quill in his mouth a preiie while together: then he cast his gowne ouer his head, and layed him downe. Archias souldiers seeing that, being at the dore of the temple, laughing him to scorne (thinking he had done so for that he was affrayed to dye) called him coward, and beast. Archias also coming to him, prayed him to rise, and beganne to vse the former perswasions, to him, promising him that he would make Antipater his frende. Then Demosthenes feeling the payson worke, cast open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, sayd vnto him: Nowe when thou wilt, play Creons parte, and throwe my bodie to the dogges, without further graue or buriall. For my parte, O god Neptune, I do goe out of thy temple being yet alieue, because I will not prophane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, haue not spared to defile thy sanctuary with blood, and cruell murder. Hauing spoken these wordes, he prayed them to stay him vp by his armeholes, for his feete began already to faile him, and thinking to goe forward, as he past by the author of Neptune, he fel downe, and geuing one gaspe, gaue vp the ghost. Now touching the payson, Aristo reporteth, that he sucked and drew it vp into his mouth out of his quill, as we haue sayd before. But one Pappus, (from whom Hermippus hath taken his history) wryteth, that when he was layed on the ground before the altuer, they founde the beginning of a letter which sayd: Demosthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Nowe his death being thus fodaine, the THRACIAN souldiers that were at the temple dore, reported that they saue him plucke the payson which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a pece of gold he had swallowed downe. Howbeit a maide of the house that serued him, being examined by Archias about it: tolde him that he had caried it about him a long time, for a preseruatiue for him. Eratothenes wryteth, that he kept this payson in a litle boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers also that do reporte his death diuersly, but to recite them all it were in vaine: fauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demosthenes verie frende) sayd, that he dyed not so fodainly by payson, but that it was the speciall fauor of the gods (to preserue him from the crueltie of the MACEDONIANS) that so fodainly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele so litle paine. Demosthenes dyed the sixteenth day of the moneth Pynepson (to wit, October) on the which day they doe celebrate at ATHENS the feast of Ceres, called Teimophoria, which is the dolefullest feast of all the yeare: on the which day also, the women remaine all day longe in the temple of the goddesse, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honor him according to his desertes, did cast his image in brasse, & made a lawe besides, that the oldest man of his house shoulde for euer be kept within the palace, at the charge of the common wealth: and ingraued these verses also upon the base of his image.

Hadst thou Demosthenes had strength according to thy hart,

The Macedons should not haue wrought the Greekes such vwoe and smart.

For they that thinke, that it was Demosthenes him selfe that made the veres in the Ile of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his payson: they are greatly deceiued. But yet a litle before my first coming to ATHENS, there went a reporte that such a thing happened. A certaine souldier being sent for to come vnto his Captaine, did put such peeces of gold as he had into the handes of Demosthenes statue, which had both his hands ioyned together: and there grew hard by it a great plane tree, diuers leaues whereof either blown of by winde by chaunce, or else by further of purpose by the souldier, couered so this golde, that it was there a long time, and so man found it: vntill such time as the souldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereupon this matter running abroad in euery mans mouth, there were diuers wise men that tooke occasion of this subiect, to make epigrammes in the praise of Demosthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enjoy the honor he thought he had newly gotten. For the iustice of the goddess, reuenger of the death of Demosthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receive iust punishment by death, of those whom he dishonestly flattered: being before grown hefull to them, and afterwards committed a fault whereby he could not escape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did persuade, and pray Perdiccas, to make him selfe king of MACEDON, & to deliuer GREGA from bondage, saying that it hong but by a threde, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater, Dinarchus. CORINTHIAN accused him, that he wrote these letters: the which so grievously offended Cassander, that first he slewe his owne sonne in his armes, and then commanded they should afterwards kill Demades, making him feeble then by those miseries which are the cruellest that can happen vnto man, that traitors betraying their owne contrie do first of all betray them selues. Demosthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleue him. Thus, my friend Sofinus, you haue what we can deliuer you, by reading, or report, touching Demosthenes life and doings.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Tullius Cicero.

*Cicero's ge-

Cicero, why fo called.

Stouching Cicero's mother, whose name was Helmia, it is reported she was a gentlewoman borne, & liued alwayes verie honestly: but for his father, the reports of him are diuers and infinite. For some say that he was borne and brought vp in a fullers shoppe: others report that he came of Tullius Astius, who while he liued was honored among the VOISCES as king, and made verie sharpe and cruell warres with the ROMANES. But surely it seemes to me, that the first of that name called Cicero, was some famous man, and that for his sake his offspring continued still that surname, and were glad to keepe it, though many men scorned it, because Cicero in English signifieth a riche pease. That Cicero had a thing vpon the tippe of his nose, as it had bene a litle wart, muche like to a riche pease, whereuppon they surnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whose life we write of now, nobly aunswered certaine of

of his frendes on a time geuing him counsell to chaunge his name, when he first made sure for office: and beganne to practise in matters of state: that he woulde endeavour him selfe to make the name of the Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Seamus, or Catalis. After that, Cicero beinge made Treasorer in SICILIE, he gaue an offering of certeine flourelt to the goddess, and at large engraued on it his two first names, MARCUS TULLIUS: and in place of his third name, he pleasauntly commaunded the workman to cut out the forme and facion of a riche pease. Thus muche they wryte of his name. Nowe for his birth, it was sayed that his mother was brought a bedde of him without any paine, the third daye of Ianuarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of ROME doe vse at this present, yearly to make solemne prayers and sacrifices vnto the goddess, for the health and prosperitie of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurse, that did prognosticate vnto her she gaue a childe sucke, which in time to come should doe great good vnto all the ROMANES. Nowe though such thinges may seeme but dreames and fables vnto many, yet Cicero him selfe shortly after proued this prophetic true: because that when he came of age to learne, he grew so toward, and wanne suche fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacite. For thereuppon came the other boyes fathers them selues to the schoole to see his face, and to be eye witnesses of the reporte that went of him, of his sharpe and quicke witte to learne. But others of the rude and baser sorte of men were offended with their sonnes, because to honor Cicero, they did alwayes put him in the midst betwene them, as they went in the streetes. Cicero in deede had suche a naturall witte and vnderstanding, as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the studie of Philosophie. For he gaue him selfe to all kinde of knowledge, and there was no arte, nor any of the liberal sciences, that he disdaind: notwithstanding in his first young yeares he was apter, and better disposed to the studie of Poetrie, then any other. There is a pretie poeme of his in verses of eight stauces, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boye. After that, beinge geuen more earnestlie vnto this studie, he was not onely thought the best Orator, but the best Poet also of all the ROMANES in his time: and yet doth the excellencie of his eloquence, and commendacion of his tongue continue, euen to this daye, notwithstanding the great alteration and chaunge of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath lost the name and estimation of it, because there were many after him that became farre more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childlike studies, he became then Philos scholler, the Academicke Philosopher, the onely scholler of all Clitomachus schollers, whome the ROMANES esteemed so muche for his eloquence, and loued more for his gentle behauiour and conuersation. He gaue him selfe also to be a follower of Mutius Scapula, who at that time was a greates man in ROME, and Prince of the Senate, and who did also instruct Cicero in the lawes of ROME. He did also followe Sylla for a time, in the warres of the MARSIANS. But when he sawe that the common wealth of ROME fell to ciuill warres, and from ciuill warres to a monarchie: then he returned againe to his booke and contemplative life, and frequented the learned men of GREGA, and alwayes studied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hande, and that he sawe all the common wealth againe at some stay. About that time, Sylla causing the goods of one that was sayd to be blasime, to be sold by the srier: (beinge one of the outlawes and proscripes, to witte, banished by billes sette vp on postes) Chrysogonus, one of Syllas freed bondemen, and in great fauour with his maister, bought them for the summe of two thousand Drachmes. Therewithall the sone and heire of the deade person called Rofinus, beinge maruelouslie offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse: for his fathers goodes amounted to the summe of two hundred and fiftie talentes. Sylla finding him selfe thus openlie touched with publike fraude and deceite, for the onely gratifyinge of his man: he procured Chrysogonus to accuse him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Orator durst speake in Rofinus behalfe to defende his cause, but thronge colour, fearing Syllas crueltie and seueritie. Wherefore poore Rofinus, the young man, seeinge his man forsake him, had no other refuge but to goe to Cicero, whome his frendes did counsell and perswade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Rofinus, cause: for he should neuer haue a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring him selfe into estimation, as this. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cause in hand, and did handle it so well, that he obtained the thing he sued for: whereby he wanne him great fame and credit. But yet being affrayed of Syllas displeasure, he absented him selfe from Rome, and went into Greece, gettinge it out that his trauell was for a disease he had vpon him. In deede Cicero was dogge leane, a litle eater, and would also eate late, because of the great weakenesse of his stomacke: but yet he had a good lowde voyce; though it was somewhat harsh, and lacked grace and comelynesse. Furthermore he was so earnest and vehement in his Oration that he mounted still with his voyce into the highest tunes: insomuche that men were affrayed it would one daye put him in hazard of his life. When he came to Athens, he went to heare Antiochus of the cite of Ascalona, and fell in greate likinge with his sweete tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he misliked his newe opinions in Philosophie. For Antiochus had then forsaken the opinions of the newe Academicke Philosophers, and the sect of the Cameades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifest proofe of things, or by his certaine iudgement; or (as some say) for that of an ambition or dissention against the schollers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reposed the resolutions of the Academicks, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the moste parte to the Stoickes opinions. Howebeit Cicero had most affection vnto the Academicks, and did studie that sect more then all the rest, of purpose, that if he sawe he were forbidden to practise in the common wealth at Rome, he would then goe to Athens (leaving all places and Orators in the common wealth) to bestowe the rest of his time quietly in the studie of Philosophie. At length, when he hearde the newes of Syllas death, and sawe that his bodie was growen to good state and health by exercise, and that his voyce became daily more and more to fill mens eares with a sweete and pleasant founde, and yet was lowde enough for the constitution of his bodie: receiuing letters dayly from his frendes at Rome, that prayed him to returne home, and moreover, Antiochus selfe also earnestlie perswadinge him to practise in the common wealth: he beganne againe to fall to the studie of Rethorike, and to frame him selfe to be eloquent, being a necessarie thing for an Orator, and did continually exercise him selfe in making Orations vpon any speache or propofition, and so frequented the chiefe Orators and masters of eloquence that were at that time. To this ende therefore he went into Asia vnto Rhodes, and amongst the Orators of Asia, he frequented Xenocles Adramettin, and Dionysius Magnesian, and studied also with Menippus Cartian: at Rhodes he hearde Apollonius Molon, and the Philosopher Pofidonius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latine tongue, he did pray Cicero for exercise sake, to declaim in Greece. Cicero was verie well contented with it, thinkinge that thereby his fautes shoulde be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamation, all those that were present were amazed to heare him, and euerie man praised him one after another. Howebeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did neuer shewe any glad countenance: and when he had ended, he stayed a greate while and sayed neuer a worde. Cicero misliking withall, Apollonius at length sayed vnto him. As for me Cicero, I doe not onely praise thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am sorie for poore Greece, to see that learning and eloquence (which were the two onely giftes and honor left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the Romanes. Nowe Cicero being verie well disposed, to goe with good hope to practise at Rome, he was a litle discouraged by an Oracle that was tolde him. For, inquiring of the god Apollo Delphian, howe he might doe to winne fame and estimation: the Nunne Pythias answered him he shoulde obtayne it, so that in his doings he would rather followe the disposition of his owne nature, then the opinion of the common people. Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the first he proceeded verie warily, and discretely, and did not willingly seeke for any office, and when he did, he was not greatly esteemed: for they commonlie called him the Greekian, and scholler, which are two wordes; the which the artificers, (and such base mechanickall people at Rome) haue euer readie at their tongues ende. Nowe he beinge by nature ambitious of honour, and pricke forward also by the persuation of his father and frendes: in the ende he beganne to pleade, and then obtained

Ciceroes first practising in the common wealth.

A obteyned not the chiefe place by litle and litle, but so soone as he fell to practise, he was immediately esteemed aboue all the other Orators and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithstanding, that for his gesture and pronounciation, hauing the selfe same defectes of nature at the beginning, which Demosthenes had: to reforme them, he carefully studied to counterfeate Rogius, an excellent commedian, and Aesop also a player of tragedies. Of this Aesop men wryte, that he playing one day Atreus parte vpon a stage (who determined with him selfe how he might be reuenged of his brother Thyestes) a seruant by chaunce hauing occasion to runne sodainly by him, he forgetting him selfe, struing to shewe the vehement passion and furie of this king, gaue him such a blowe on his head with the scepter in his hand, that he slue him dead in the place. Euen so Ciceroes words were of so great force to perswade, by means of his grace and pronounciation. For he mocking the Orators that thrust out their heades, and cried in their Orations, was wont to say that they were like to lame men, who were driuen to ryde, because they could not goe a foote: euen so (sayed he) they crie out, because they can not speake. Truly pleasaunt townes doe grace an Orator, and sheweth a fine witte: but yet Cicero vied them so commonly, that they were offensiu vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious coffer and spitefull man. He was chosen Treasorer in the time of dearth, when there was great scarcetie of corne at Rome: and the prouince of Sicilie fell to his lotte. At his first comming thither, the Sicilians misliked him verie much, because he compelled them to sende corne vnto Rome: but after they had founde his diligence, iustice, and lenitie, they honored him aboue any Gouernor that euer was sent from Rome. Nowe there were diuers young gentlemen of Rome of noble houses, who beinge accused for sundrie fautes committed in warres against their honor, and martiall discipline, had bene sent backe againe vnto the Prætor of Sicilie: for whome Cicero pleaded, and did so excellently defende their cause, that they were pardoned euerie man. Thereupon, thinking well of him selfe, when his time expired, he went to Rome, and by the way there happened a pretty iest vnto him. As he passed through the contrie of Campania, (otherwise called the lande of labor) he met by chaunce with one of the chiefe Romanes of all his friends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they sayd of him at Rome, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all Rome had bene full of the glorie of his name and deedes. His frende asked him againe: and where hast thou bene Cicero all this while, that we haue not seene thee at Rome? This killed his hart straight, when he sawe that the reporte of his name and doings, entring into the cite of Rome as into an infinite sea, was so sodainly vanquished away againe, without any other fame or speech. But after that, when he looked into him selfe, and sawe that in reason he tooke an infinite labor in hande to attaine to glorie, wherein he sawe no certaine ende whereby to attaine vnto it: it cut of a great parte of the ambition he had in his head. And yet the great pleasure he tooke to heare his owne praise, and to be ouermuche geuen to desire of honor and estimation: those two things continued with him euen to his dying day, and did oftsoones make him swarue from iustice. Furthermore, when he beganne thorowly to practise in the affaires of the state, he thought it an ill thing that artificers and craftes men shoulde haue many sortes of instruments and tooles without life, to knowe the names of euerie one of them, the places where they shoulde take them, and the vse whereto they shoulde employ them: and that a man of knowledge and qualitie (who doth all things with the helpe and seruice of men) shoulde be slothfull, and carelesse, to learne to knowe the names of his citizens. Therefore he gaue him selfe to knowe, not onely mens names of qualitie, but the streetes also they dwelt in, what parte of the cite fouer it was: their goodly houses in the contrie; the frendes they made of, and the neighbours whome they companied with. So that when he went abroade into Italy, wherefoeuer he became, Cicero coulde shewe and name his frendes houses. He was not verie riche, and yet he had enough to serue his turne: the which made men muse the more at him, and they loued him the better, because he tooke no fee nor gifte for his pleading, what cause soeuer he had in hande, but then specially, when he defended a matter against Verres. This Verres had bene Prætor of Sicilie, and had committed many lewde partes there, for the which the Sicilians did accuse him.

Cicero taking upon him to defende their cause, made Verres to be condemned, not by pleading, but in manner without pleading, and in this sorte. The Prætors being his Iudges, and fauoring Verres, had made so many reuolumentes and delayes, that they had driuen it of to the laste day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he shoulde not haue day light to speake all that he had to say against him, and that thereby nothing shoulde be done and iudged: he rose vp, and sayed, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but onely brought forth the witnesses before the Iudges, and hauing caused their depocitions to be taken, he prayed they would proceede to sentence, according to their euidence geuen on that behalfe. Yet some doe reporte, that Cicero gaue many pleasant tawntes and girdes, in pleading the accusation of the SICILIANS against Verres. The ROMANES doe call a bore, Verres. There was one Cælius, the sonne of a freed bondman, who was suspected to holde the superstition of the IEWES. This Cælius would haue put by the SICILIANS from following the accusation of Verres, and would haue had the matter of his accusation only referred to him, for the prosecuting of it against him. Cicero skorning his sute, sayd vnto him: what hath a Iewe to doe with a Iwine? This Verres had a sonne somewhat about twentie yeares of age, who (as the reporte went) had a verie ill name for his beawtie. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mocke Cicero, saying that he was too womanly: his children (sayd he) are to be reprobued of that secretly at home. In this accusation, Hortensius the Orator durst not directly defende Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to aunswere for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuory geuen him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gaue him a pretie nippe by the way: but Hortensius not vnderstanding him, sayd he coulde no skill of darke speeches. Well, sayd Cicero, yet hast thou a sphinx in thy house. In the ende Verres being condemned, and a fine sette on his heade to the value of seuentie fine Myriades, Cicero notwithstandinge was suspected to be bribed with money for agreeing to cast him in so small a summe. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the SICILIANS to shew them selues thankfull to him, both brought and sent him many presentes out of SICILE. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vse, but onely bestowed their liberalitie in bringing downe the prizes of vitrells at ROME. He had a goodly house within the confines of the citie of ARPOS, a farme also by NAPLES, and an other about the citie of POMPEII: but all these were no great things. Afterwardes also he had the ioynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the summe of twelue Myriades, and besides all this, there came to him by inheritance, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereupon he liued verie honestly and soberly, without excess, with his familiar frendes that loued him, both GRÆCIANS and ROMANES, and would neuer goe to supper till after sunne set, not so muche for any great businesse he had, as for the weakenesse of his stomake. But otherwise he was verie curious, and carefull of his person, and would be rubbed and nought, and he would vse also to walke a certaine number of turnes by proportion: and so exercising his bodie in that sorte, he was neuer sicke, and besides was alwayes verie strong and lustie of bodie, able to abide great paines and sorowes which he fell into afterwarde. He gaue his fathers chiefe mansion house to his brother, and went to dwell him selfe in the mount Palatine: bicause such a came to waite vpon him to doe him honor, shoulde not take the paines to goe so farre to see him. For, he had as many men daily at his gate euerie morning, as either Craffus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his eltimacion among the fouldiers both of them being at that time the chiefeest men of ROME. Yea furthermore, Pompeys selfe came vnto Cicero, bicause his Orations stode him to great purpose, for thincrase of his honor and authoritie. Nowe when Cicero came to make sute to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinarie iudge) though he had many competitors, and fellowe suters with him, yet was he first chosen affore them all: and he did so honestly behaue him selfe in that office, that they did not so muche as once suspect him of briberie or extortion. And for prooffe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Mæcer (a man that of him selfe was of great power, and yet fauored and supported besides by Craffus) was accused before Cicero of theft and extortion in his office: but he trustinge muche to his supposed credit, and to the great suite and labour his frendes made for him, went home to his house before sentence proceeded against

Against him (the Iudges being yet to geue their opinions) and there speedily trimmed his beard; and put a newe gowne vpon his backe, as though he had bene fure to haue bene quire of his accusation; and then returned againe into the market place. But Craffus went to meete him, and tolde him all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Mæcer tooke such a grieue and conceit vpon it, that he went home to his house againe, layed him downe on his bedde, and neuer rose after. This iudgement wanne Cicero great fame, for they praised him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to see iustice duly executed: An other called also Vatinus, (a bedlem fellowe, and one that behaued him selfe verie vnreuerently to the Magistrates in his pleading, and besides had a swollen necke) came verie arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall seate, and asked him a thing, which Cicero would not graunt him there, but would thinke of it at better leasure. Thereupon Vatinus tolde him, that he would not be scrupulous to graunt that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, aunswered him againe: no more haue I (sayd he) such a swollen necke as thou hast. Towardes the ende of his office, two or three dayes before his time expired, there was one accused Manilius before him: that he also had robbed the common wealth. This Manilius was verie well beloued of the common people, who were perswaded that he was put in sute, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to despise Pompey with, whose familiar frende he was. So he required certaine dayes to aunswere the matter he was accused of: but Cicero would geue him no further respite, but to aunswere it the next day. The people therewith were maruelously offended, bicause the other Prætors in such like cases were wont to geue tenne dayes respite to others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and also accused him vnto them: he besought Cicero to heare him pacientlie. Cicero made him aunswere, that hauinge alwayes vsed as muche fauour and curesse as he possible might by lawe, vnto those that were accused, he thought he shoulde offer Manilius too great wrong, if he shoulde not doe the like to him: wherefore, bicause he had but one day more to continue Prætor in office, he had purposely geuen him that day to make his aunswere before him. For he thought that to leave his accusation to the hearing of an other Prætor, he coulde not haue bene thought a man that had borne him good will, and ment to pleasure him. These wordes did maruelously change the peoples opinion and affection towards him, and euerie man speaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cause. He willingly granted them: and coming from the benche, standing at the barre like an Orator to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and spake both boldly and sharply against the chiefe men of the citie, and those speciallie that did enuie Pompey. This notwithstanding, when he came to sue to be Consul, he founde as great fauour amongst the Nobilitie, as he did with the communitie. For they did further his sute, for the common wealths sake, vpon this occasion. The change and alteration of gouernment the which Sylla brought in, was thought straunge at the first among the people: but now men by proceesse of time being vsed to it, it was thoroughly established, and no man misliked it. At that time many men practised to subuert the gouernment, not for the benefit of the common wealth, but to serue their owne couetous mindes. For Pompey being then in the East partes, made warres with the kings of PONTVS and ARMENIA, and had not left sufficient force at ROME to oppresse these seditious persons, that sought nothing but rebellion. These men had made Lucius Catiline their Captaine: a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise, fittle, and malicious of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vile fautes) for deflowering of his owne daughter, and killinge his brother: and being affrayed to be put in sute for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brother amongst the number of the outlawes (or proscriptes) as if he had bene then alieue. These wicked rebells hauinge chosen them such a Captaine, were sworne and bounde one to an other in this manner. They killed a man, and did eate of his fleshe together, and had besides corrupted the most parte of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine suffered euerie man to take his pleasure, as his youth was inclined vnto: as to banket, to followe harlots, and gaue them money largelie to bestowe in these vayne expences. Furthermore all THYSCAN beganne to rise, and the most parte of GAULE also, lying betwene the Alpes and ITALIA.

wickedness.

The citie of ROME it selfe was also in great daunger of rising, for the inequalitye of the goods of the inhabitants. For the noble men, and of greatest courage, had spent all their lands in plays and feasts, or in buildings and common works, which they built at their owne charge, to currie fauour with the common people, that they might obtaine the chief offices; so that thereby they became verie poore, and their goodes were in the handes of meane men and wretches. Thus the state of ROME stood in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might easily haue procured, that durst haue taken vpon him any change or alteration of gouernment, there was then suche diuision among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding, to provide him of a strong bulwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consul, hoping that he should be chosen with Caius Antonius, a man that of him selfe was apt neither to doe any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great strength and aide vnto him that would attempt any thing. Diuers noble and wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cicero to sue for the Consulshippe. The people accepted him, and reiecte Catiline. Antonius and Cicero thereupon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of all the suiters for the Consulship was but only a Knights sonne, and not the sonne of a Senator of ROME. Nowe, though the common people vnderstoode not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline: yet at the beginning of Cicero's Consulshippe, there fell out great trouble and contention in the common wealth. For they of the one side, whom Sylla had by his ordinaunces depofed from their dignities and offices in ROME (who were no small men, neither fewe in number) beganne to creepe into the peoples good will, alleaging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any change or alteration in the common wealth. The Tribunes on the other side preferred lawes and ordinaunces to further this deuise. They preferred the lawe to choofe the Decemuiiri, with soueraine power and authoritie through all ITALIA and SYRIA, and also through all the contries and prouinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of ROME: to sell, and releafe all the landes belonging to the state of ROME, to accuse any man whome they thought good, to banishe any man, to restore the Colonies with people, to take what money they would out of the treasure, to leaue men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiiri, there were many men of great accept that fauored this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellowe Consul with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was priuie vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, because he was so much in det. And this was it that the noble men most feared of all other things. Thereupon Cicero, to provide first to prevent this daunger, granted him the prouince of the realme of MACEDON: and the prouince of GAUL being offered vnto him selfe, he refused it. By this good turne, he wanne Antonius like a hired player making him to promise him that he would assist & aide him for the benefit of the common wealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had wonne him to his minde: he then beganne to be the bolder, and more slowly to resist them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reprove, and inuey against this law of the Decemuiiri, which the Tribunes would haue established. But thereby he did so terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to haue it to passe, & appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commaunded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiiri, which the Tribunes did preferre: but furthermore they were vtterly discouraged and out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in ROME made the ROMANES know, how much eloquence doth grace and beawtifeth that which is honest, and how inuincible right and iustice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wise Gouernor of a common weale, should alwayes in his doings rather preferre profit, than to seeke to currie fauor with the common people: yet so to vse his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweete

& pleasant tongue, may be alleaged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the pastimes. For before, the knights of ROME did sit mingled one with another amongst the common people, and took their places as they came. The first that made the difference betweene them, was Marcius Orho, at that time Prætor who made a law, by the which he appoynted feuerall seats for the knights, where they might from thenceforth see the pastimes. The people took this grieuouly, as a thing done to discomtente them: inso much that Orho comming afterwards into the Theater, all the common people fel a whistling at him, to shame him withal. The knights also in contrariwise made him roome amongst them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people fel a whistling lowder then before, and the knights in like manner to clapping of their hands. And so grew to wordes one with another: that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderstanding it, went thither him selfe, & calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharply reproveth them, and therewith so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receiue Orho with clapping of their handes, and contended with the knights which of them should doe him greatest honor. But now againe, the rebels of Catilines conspiracie (who were pretily cooled at the first for the feare they stood in) began to be lustie againe, and to gather together, boldly incoring one another to broache their practise, before Pompey returned, who was sayd to be on the way towards ROME with his armye. But besides them, those souldiers that had serued before in the warres vnder Sylla, being disperfed vpe and downe ITALY, (but specially the best souldiers among them dwelling in the good townes of THYSCAN) did stirre vp Catiline to hasten the enterprise, perswading them selues that they should once againe haue goods enough at hand, to spoyle and ranfacke at their pleasure. These souldiers hauing one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conspyred with Catiline, and came to ROME to assist him in his lute: who purposed once againe to demand the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The goddes also did plainly shewe by earthquakes, lightning & thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracie: besides also, there fell out manifest coniectures & proofes by men that came to reuale them, howbeit they had not power sufficient to encounter to noble a man, and of so great power as Catiline was. Cicero therefore deferring the day of election, called Catiline into the Senate, and there did examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline supposing there were many in the Senate that had good wills to rebell, and also because he would shewe him self ready vnto them that were of his conspiracie: he gaue Cicero a gentle answer, & said thus, What doe I offend, sayd he, if that being two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weak, and thoroughly rotten, and hath a head: and the other being great, strong, & of power, hauing no head, I doe giue it one? meaning vnder this darke answer, to signifie the people & Senate. This answer being made, Cicero was more affrayd then before, inso much that he put on a brigantine for the safetie of his body, & was accompanied with the chiefe men of ROME, and a great number of younge men besides, going with him from his house vnto the fieldes of Mars, where the elections were made: & had of purpose left open his iackett lose at the choller, that his brigantyne he had on might be seene, thereby to let euery man that saw him, know the daunger he was in. Euery man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to assaile him. But it so came to passe, that by voyces of the people, Catiline was againe reiecte from the Consulship, and Syllanus and Murena chosen Consuls. Shortly after this election, the souldiers of THYSCAN being ioyned, which should haue come to Catiline, and the day appoynted being at hand to broache their enterprise: about midnight there came three of the chiefe men of ROME to Cicero's house (Marcus Crassus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his porter, and bad him wake his maister presently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to speake with him, about a matter of importance. At night after supper, Crassus porter brought his maister a packet of letters, delivered him by a straunger vnknown, which were directed vnto diuers persons, amonge the which one of them had no name subscribed, but was onely directed vnto Crassus him self. The effect of his letter was, that there should be a great slaughter in ROME made by Catiline, and therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to save him selfe. Craffus having read his owne letter, would not open the rest, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the daunger, and partly also to cleere him selfe of the suspition they had of him for the friendship that was betwixt him and Catiline. Cicero counselling with them what was to be done, the next morning assembled the Senate very rarely, and carrying the letters with him, he did deliver them according to their direction, and commanded they should read them out alowde. All these letters, & every one of them particularly, did bewray the conspiracie. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius, a man of authoritie, and that had bene Prætor, tolde openly the souldiers and men of warre that were leauied in Thyscan. And it was reported also, that Manlius was in the fildes with a great number of souldiers about the cities of Thyscan, gaping daily to heare newes of some change at Rome. All these things being thoroughly considered, a decree passed by the Senate, that they should referre the care of the common wealth vnto the Consuls, to the end that with absolute authoritie they might (as well as they could) provide for the safetie and preservation thereof. Such manner of decree and authoritie, was not often scene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of present feare and daunger. Now Cicero hauing this absolute power, he referred all foreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, and did him self take vpon him the care and gouernment of all ciuill affaires within Rome. On the day time when he went vp and downe the towne, he had such a trowpe of men after him, that when he came through the great market place, he almost filled it with his trayne that followed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but resolved to goe him selfe vnto Manlius where their armie lay. But before he departed, he had drawn into his confederacie one Martius, & another called Cethegus, whome he commanded betimes in the morning to goe to Ciceros house with short daggers to kill him, pretending to come to salute him, and to giue him a good morrow. But there was a noble woman of Rome, called Fulbia, who went our night vnto Cicero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who in deede came the next morning betimes vnto him; but being denied to be let in, he began to chafe and raile before the gate. This made him the more to be suspected. In the end Cicero coming out of his house, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to say, a staye) which standeth at the vpper end of the holy streete as they goe to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he ment to cleere him selfe of the suspition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would sit downe by him, but they did all rise from the benche where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to speake, he could haue no audience for the great noyse they made against him. So at length Cicero rose, and commanded him to auoid out of Rome saying, that there must needs be a separation of walles betwene them two, considering that the one vsed but words, and the other force of armes. Catiline thereupon immediately departing the citie with three hundred armed men, was no sooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeants carry axes and bundells of rodde before him, as if he had bene a Consul lawfully created, and did display his ensignes of warre, & so went in this order to seeke Manlius. When they were ioyned, he had not much lesse then twenty thousand men together, with the which he went to practise the townes to rebell. Nowe open warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciceros colleague and fellowe Consul, was sent against him to fight with him. In the meane space, Cornelius Lentulus surnamed Sura (a man of a noble house, but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put of the Senate) assembled all the rest which were of Catilines conspiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be affraid of nothing. He was then Prætor the second time, as the manner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignitie of a Senator which he had lost. It is reported that this surname of Sura was giuen him vpon this occasion. He being Treasurer in Syllas Dictatorship, did fondly waste and consume a marvelous summe of money of the common treasure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an accompt of him before the Senate: he carelessly and contemptuously stepped forth, saying he could make him no other accompt, but shewed him the calfe of his legges, as children doe, when they make a fault at tennis. And thereof it came that euer after that they called him Sura, because Sura in Latin signifieth, the calfe of the legges. Another time also being accused for a lewde part he had committed, he bribed some of the Judges

Judges with money, and being onely quit by two voyces more which he had in his fauor, he said he had lost his money he had giuen to one of those two Judges, because it was enough for him to be cleered by one voice more. This man being of this disposition, was first of all incensed by Catiline, and lastly marred by certaine wifards & false prognosticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, singing verses vnto him which they had sayned and deuised, and false prophecies also, which they bare him in hande they had taken out of Sybbles bookes of prophecie, which sayd: that there should raigne three Cornelii at Rome, of the which, two had already fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla, and for the third, fortune layd it vpon him, and therefore bad him goe thorow withall, and not to dreame it out losing opportunitie as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus vnderooke no small enterprife, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Senate, and as many other Citizens as they could murder, and to set fire of Rome, sparing none but Pompeys sonnes, whome they would referue for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey. For the rumor was very great and certain also, that he returned from very great warres and conquests which he had made in the East contries. So they layd a plat to put their treason in execution, in one of the nights of Saturnes feastes. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimstone, and a great number of armors and weapons into Cethegus house. Besides all this prouision, they had appoynted a hundred men in an hundred partes of the citie, to the ende that fire being rayfed in many places at one tyme, it should the sooner runne through the whole citie. Other men also were appoynted to stoppe the pyes and water conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill those also that came for water to quench the fire. In all this sturre, by chauce there were two Ambassadors of the Allobroges, whose contrie at that tyme did much milke of the Romanes, and were vnwilling to be subiect vnto them. Lentulus thought these men very fit instruments to cause all Gaule to rebell. Thereupon practising with them, he wanne them to be of their conspiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the counsell of their contrie, and in them did promise them freedom. He sent other letters also vnto Catiline, and perswaded him to proclaim libertie to all bondmen, and to come with all the speede he could to Rome; and sent with them one Titus of the citie of Crotona to carry these letters. But all their counsells and purposes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feastes, drinking droncke with light women) were easily found out by Cicero: who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wisely and discretely sawe thorow them. For he had appoynted men out of the citie to spie their doings, which followed them to see what they intended. Furthermore he spake secretly with some he trusted, (the which others also tooke to be of the conspiracie) and knewe by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practised with the Ambassadors of the Allobroges, and drawn them into their conspiracie. At length he watched them one night so narrowly, that he tooke the Ambassadors, and Titus Crotonian with the letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambassadors of the Allobroges, which had secretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero assembled the Senate in the temple of Concorde, and there openly red the letters, and heard the evidence of the witnesses. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that some heard Cethegus say they should kill three Consuls, and foure Prætors. E. Piso a Senator also, and that had bene Consul, tolde in manner the selfe same tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was sent into Cethegus house, reported that he had found great store of darts, armor, daggers and swordes new made. Lastly the Senate hauing promised Titus Crotonian he should haue no hurt, so he would tell what he knew of this conspiracie: Lentulus thereby was conuincid, and driuen to giue vppe his office of Prætor before the Senate, and changing his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miserable state. This being done, Lentulus and his consorts were committed to warde, to the Prætors houses. Now growing towards euening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was assembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thereupon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friends house of his hard by: for that his owne house was occupied by the Ladies of the citie, who were busy solemnly celebrating a secret sacrifice in the honor of the goddesse, called of the Romanes the good goddesse, and of the Grecians Gynæcia, to wit feminine: vnto her this yearly sacrifice is done at the Consuls house, by the wife or mother of the Consul then being, the Vestal Nunnes being present at it. Now Cicero being come into his neighbours house, beganne to bethinke him what course he were best to take in this matter. For, to punish the offenders with severitie, according to their deserts, he was afraid to doe it: both because he was of a courteous nature, as also for that he would not seeme to be glad to have occasion to shew his absolute power and authority, to punish (as he might) with rigour, Citizens that were of the noblest houses of the citie, & that had besides many friends; And contrariwise also, being remisse in so waichtige a matter as this, he was afraid of the danger that might ensue of their rashnes, mistrusting that if he should punish them with lesse then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and desperate then euer they were: adding moreover the stynge and spight of a newe malice vnto their accustomed wickednes, besides that he him selfe should be thought a coward and tymerous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with these doubts, there appeared a miracle to the Ladies, doing sacrifice at home in his house. For the fire that was thought to be cleane out vpon the altare where they had sacrificed, there sodainly rose out of the imbers of the rynd or barks which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amased all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Vestal Nunnes willed Terentia (Ciceros wife) to go straight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be afraid to execute that boldly which he had considered of, for the benefit of the common wealthe: and that the goddesse had raised this great flame, to shewe him that he should have great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorous nor faint hearted woman, but very ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affaires of the state, then otherwise she had acquainted him with her housewifery in the house, as Cicero him selfe reporteth: she went to make report thereof vnto him, and prayed him to doe execution of those men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, and also Publius Nigidius, his friend and fellow student with him in Philosophie, and whose counsell also Cicero followed much in the government of the common wealthe. The next morning, the matter being propounded to the arbitrement of the Senate, how these malefactors should be punished: Syllanus being asked his opinion first, said that they should be put in prison, and from thence to suffer execution. Others likewise that followed him, were all of that minde, but Caius Cesar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but a young man, and began to come forward, but yet such a one, as by his behavior and the hope he had, tooke such a course, that afterwards he brought the common wealthe of Rome into an absolute Monarchie. For at that time, Cicero had vehement suspitions of Cesar, but no apparant proofe to convince him. And some say, that it was brought so neare, as he was almost convicted, but yet saued him selfe. Other write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly dissembled, that he either heard or knew any signes which were told him against Cesar, being afraid in deede of his friends and estimation. For it was a cleere case, that if they had accused Cesar with the rest, he vndoubtedly had sooner saued all their liues, then he should have lost his owne. Nowe when Cesar came to deliuer his opinion touching the punishment of these prisoners: he stoode vp and sayde, that he did not thinke it good to put them to death, but to confiscate their goods: and as for their persons, that they should be throw them in prison, some in one place, some in another, in such cities of Italy, as pleased Cicero best. Till the warre of Caesars were ended. This sentence being very mild, and the author thereof marvellous eloquent to make it good: Cicero him selfe added thereto a counterpease, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the first, and partly also the opinion of Cesar. His friends thinking that Cesars opinion was the safest for Cicero, because thereby he should deserue lesse blame for that he had not put the prisoners to death: they followed rather the second. Whereupon Syllanus also recanted that he had spoken, and expounded his opinion: saying, that when he spake they should be put to death, he ment nothing so, but thought the last punishment a Senator of Rome could haue, was the prison. But the first that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Lucatius, and after him Cato, who with vehemement wordes enforced Cesars supsition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and courage: so that euen vpon the instant it was decreed by most voyces, that they should suffer death. But Cesar stept vp againe, & spake against the confiscation of their goods, mistaking that they should

reicct the gentlest part of his opinion, and that contrariwise they should sticke vnto the sentence only: howbeit because the greatest number prevailed against him, he called the Tribunes to ayde him, to the ende they should withstand it: but they would giue no eare vnto him. Cicero thereupon yielding of him selfe, did remit the confiscation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetch the prisoners: who were not all in one house; but every Prator had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy streete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefe men of the citie, who compassed him round about, and garded his person. The people seeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, passed by, and sayd neuer a word: and specially the young men, who thought it had bene some solemne misterie for the health of their contry, that was to accompany with the chiefe Magistrate, and the noble men of the citie, with terror and feare: So when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliuered Lentulus into the hands of the hangman, and commaunded him to doe execution. Afterwards also Cethegus, and then all the rest one after another, whome he brought to the prison him selfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing diuers of their accomplices in a troupe together in the market place, who knewe nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet aliue: he turned vnto them, and spake aloud, they liued. This is a phrase of speeche which the Romans vse sometime, when they will finely conuey the hardnes of the speeche, to say he is dead. When night was come, and that Cicero was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did wayte vpon him no more with silence as before, but with great cries of his praise, and clapping of handes in euery place he went, and called him Sauour, and second founder of Rome. Besides all this, at euery mans door there were lynckes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes, as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the toppes of their houses to doe him honor, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long traine of the chiefe men of the citie, of the which many of them had ended great warres for the which they had triumphed, and had obteyned many famous conquests to the Empire of Rome, both by sea and land) confessing betwene them selues one to another, that the Romans were greatly bound to many Captaines and generalls of armies in their time, for the wonderful riches, spoiles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thank Cicero onely for their health and preseruacion, hauing saued them from so great and extreme a danger. Not forthat they thought it so wonderfull an acte to haue stricken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to haue punished the offenders by death: but because the conspiracie of Caesars being so great and dangerous an insurrection as euer was any; he had quenched it, and plucked it vp by the rootes, with so small hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall sedition. For, the most part of them that were gathered together about Caesars, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him: and Caesars him selfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him, against Antonius the other Consul with Cicero, he was slayne in the field, and all his armie defeated. This notwithstanding, there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this acte, and ment to make him repent it, hauing for their heades Cesar, (who was already chosen Prator for the yeare to come) Brutus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so soone as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once suffer Cicero to speake to the people, notwithstanding that he was yet in his office of Consul for certaine dayes. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake vnto the people, they did set their benches vpon the pulpit for orations, which they call at Rome Rostres: and would neuer suffer him to set foote in it; but onely to resigne his office, and that done, to come downe againe immediatly. He graunted thereto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition. So silence being made him, he made an othe, not like vnto other Consuls othes when they resigne their office in like manner, but strange; and neuer heard of before: swearing, that he had saued the citie of Rome, and preserued all his contry, and the Empire of Rome from viter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present, confirmed it, and sware the like othe. Wherewithall Cesar and the other Tribunes his enemies were so offended with him, that they deuided to breede him some new sturre & trouble: & amongst others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be sent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato, (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the common wealth, opposing him selfe against all their practices, with the like authoritie and power that they had, being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not only easily breake all their denises, but also in a goodly oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised and extolled Cicero's Consulship vnto them, and the things he did in his office: that they gaue him the greatest honors that euer were decreed or graunted vnto any man liuing. For by decree of the people he was called, father of the contry, as Cato him selfe had called him in his oration: the which name was neuer giuen to any man, but onely vnto him, & also he bare greater sway in Rome at that time, then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he made him selfe enuyed and misliked of many men, not for any ill acte he did, or ment to doe: but onely because he did too much boast of him selfe. For he neuer was in any assembly of people, Senate, or iudgement, but euery mans head was full still to heare the sound of Catulus and Lentulus brought in for sporte, and filling the bookes and workes he compiled besides full of his owne prayes: the which made his sweete and pleasant stile, tedious, and troublesome to those that heard them, as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worne of ambition, and extreme couetous desire of honor in his head, yet did he not mallice or enuy any others glory, but would very frankly praise excellent men, as well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They haue written also certaine notable wordes he spake of some auncient men in olde time, as of Aristotle: that he was like a golden flowing riuier: and of Plato, that if Iupiter him selfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: & of Demosthenes orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: the longest faide he. There be diuers writers also, who to shewe that they were great followers of Demosthenes, doe followe Cicero's saying in a certaine epistle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he said that Demosthenes slept in some of his orations: but yet they forget to tel how highly he praised him in that place, and that he calleth the orations which he wrote against Antony (in the which he tooke great paines, and studied more then all the rest) PHILIPPICANS: to followe those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip king of Macedon. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his tyme, either in eloquence, or in learning, whose fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obteyned of Cesar, when he had the Empire of Rome in his handes, that Crautippus the PERIPATETICKE Philosopher was made Citizen of Rome. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Arcopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extant also of Cicero's epistles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his sonne, willing him to followe Crautippus in his studie and knowledge. He wrote an other letter also vnto Gorgias the Rethoritian, and forbad him his sonnes company: because he vnderstood he intised him to dronkenness, & to other great dishonestie. Of all his epistles he wrote in grecke, there is but that onely written in choller, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, and to tawnt him in his letter: because (as it seemed) he was a man of very lewde life and conuersation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding him selfe greued with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordeine some publike honors in his behalfe: that me thinks proceeded of ouermuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely because he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cause before the Iudges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his: it is reported that he was so angry with him, that he told him, what Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine accusation, not for thine innocency, but for a miste I cast before the Iudges eyes, that made them they could not discern the fault? A of the people: shortly after he spake to the contrary, all the euill he could of him, in the same place. Why, how now, sayde Crassus: didst thou not thy selfe highly praye me in this place, the last day? I can not deny it, sayd Cicero: but in deede I tooke an ill matter in hand to shewe mine eloquence. An other time Crassus chaunced to say in an open assembly, that none of all the Crassi of his house that euer liued aboute lx. yeares: and afterwards againe repenting him selfe, he called it in againe, and sayde, Sure I knewe not what I did, when I sayd so. Cicero answered him againe: thou knewest well enough the people were glad to heare it, and therefore spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the opinion of the Stoicke Philosophers, that sayd the wife man was euer riche: Cicero answered him, and bad him consider whether they ment not thereby, that the wife man had all things. Crassus couetousnes was defamed of euery man. Of Crassus sonnes, one of them did much resemble Crassus, and therefore his mother had an ill name by him: one daye this sonne of Crassus made an oration before the Senate, which diuers of them commended very much. So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: me thinks, sayde he, it is * Achius of Crassus. About this tyme, Crassus being ready to take his iorney into SYRIA, he desired to haue Cicero his friend, rather then his enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he tolde Cicero that he would come and suppe with him. Cicero sayde he should be welcome. Shortly after some of his friendes told him of Vasinius, how he was desirous to be made friendes with him, for he was his enemy. What, quoth Cicero, and will he come to supper too? Thus he vled Crassus. Now this Vitinius hauing a swollen necke, one daye pleading before Cicero: he called him the swollen Orator. Another tyme when he heard say that he was dead, and then that he was alieue againe: a vengeance on him, sayde he, that hath lyed so shamefully. Another tyme when Cesar had made a lawe for the deuiding of the lands of CAMPANIA vnto the fouldiers: diuers of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very olde man) said, he would neuer graunt it while he liued. Cicero pleasantly answered againe, alas, tary a litle, the good olde man will not trouble you long. Another tyme there was one Octavius, supposed to be * an AFRICAN borne. He when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, saide that he heard him not: Cicero presently answered him againe, and yet hast thou a hole bored through thine eare. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowen moe men by his wittnes, then he had faued by his eloquence. I graunt saide Cicero, for in deede I haue more faith, then eloquence in D me. So was there also a younge man that was suspected to haue poysoned his father with a tarte, that boasted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather haue that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy tarte. Publius Sextius also hauing a matter before the Iudges, enterteyned Cicero, with other of his Counsellors: but yet he would speake all him selfe, and giue none of the Orators leaue to say any thing. In the ende, when they sawe plainly that the Iudges would discharge him, being ready to giue sentence: Cicero saide vnto him, besturre thee hardly to day for to morrowe Sextius thou shalt be a priuate man. Another, one Publius Scotta, who would sayne haue bene thought a wife Lawyer, and yet had litle witte and vnderstanding: Cicero appealed to him as a wittnes in a matter, and being examined, he answered he knewe nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: thou thinkest peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. E Again, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeat, who is thy father? Cicero answered him againe: thy mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as litle witted and vnconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exercise of his office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey, vpon no occasion: and as fondly againe he returned thence, vpon a foudaine. His Schoolemaister Philager also being dead, he buried him very honestly, and set a crowne of stone vpon the toppes of his tonbe. Cicero finding it, tolde him thou hast done very wisely: for thy Maister hath taught thee rather to lye, then to speake. Another time Appius Claudius pleading a matter, saide in his preamble that his friende had earnestly requested him to employe all his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O goddes, saide Cicero, and hast thou shewed thy selfe so harde harted to thy friende, that thou hast performed none of all these he requested thee? Nowe to vse these fine tawnts and girds to his enemies, it was a parte of a good Orator: but lo comonly to irrite euery man to make the people laughe, that wanne him greate ill will of many, as shall appeare by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two sonnes in lawe, who were both banished: Cicero therefore called him Adriastus. Lucius Costa by chaunce also was Censor at that tyme, when Cicero sued to be Consul: and being there at the daye of the election, he was a thyrst, and was driuen to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friendes stood about him, and after he had dronke, he saide vnto them. It is well done of ye, sayde he, to be affrayed least the Censor should beangry with me, bicause I drinke water: for it was reported the Censor loued wine well. Another tyme Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three foule Daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloud:

It was thought in Rome that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one daye in the Senate very lowde: Cicero layde vnto them that were about him, wonder not at it, for he, for this man hath bene a cryer in his dayes. Fautus, the sonne of Sylla Dictator at Rome, which sette vpp billes outlawing diuers ROMANES, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without daunger where they founde them: this man after he had spent the moste parte of his fathers goods, was so fore in debt, that he was driuen to sell his household stuffe, by billes sette vp on euery poste. Cicero when he sawe them, yea mary saide he, these billes please me better, then those which his father sette vpp. These tawntes and common quippes without purpose, made diuers men to malice him. The great ill will that Clodius bare him, beganne vppon this occasion. Clodius was of a noble house, a younge man, and very wilde and insolent. He being in loue with Pompeia Casars wife, founde the meanes secretly to gette into Casars house, apparelled like a younge singing wenche, bicause on that daye the Ladyes of Rome did solemnly celebrate a secret sacrifice in Casars house, which is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he shoulde not haue bene knowne, bicause he was but a younge man without any heare on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongst the other women. He beeing gotten into this great house by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it: there was one of Casars mothers maydes of her chamber called Aurelia, who seeing him wandering vp and downe the house in this sorte, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to aunswer, he saide he sought for Aura, one of Pompeias maides. The maide perceiued straight it was a womans voice, and therewithal gaue a great shrille, and called the other women: the which did see the gates fast shut, and then sought euery corner vp and downe, so that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blown abroad in the cite, whereuppon Cesar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the sacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, beeing one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to garde him, if any man would haue offered him iniurie in the busse time of the conspiracie of Castiline. Clodius stowly denied the matter he was burdened with, and saide that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence against him, and depofed, that the selfe same daye he came home to his house vnto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This in deede was true, though it seemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence so muche for the truthe sake, as to please his wife Terentia: for she hated Clodius to the deathe, bicause of his sister Clodia that would haue married Cicero, and did secretly practise the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceros very friende, and bicause he repayed very often to this Clodia that dwelt harde by Cicero, Terentia beganne to suspect him. Terentia beeing a cruell woman, and wearing her husbandes breeches: allured Cicero to sette vppon Clodius in his aduerfitee, and to witnesse agaynst him, as many other honest men of the cite also did: Some that he was perjured, others that he committed a throwfande lewde partes, that he byrbed the people with money, that he had intised and deflowred many women. Lucullus also brought forth certayne Maydens which depofed that Clodius had deflowred the youngest of his owne sisters, she beeing in house with him, and maryed. And there went a greate rumor also, that he

A knewe his two other sisters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and married vnto king Martius: and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had married, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: bicause one of her Paramours sent her a puse full of quadrans (which are litle peeces of copper money) in stead of filer. Clodius was flandered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the people were very much offended with them, that gaue euidence against him, and accused him. The Iudges being affrayed of a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his iudgement, for the safetie of their persons: and in the tables where they wrote their sentences, their letters for the most part were confusedly set downe. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: and it was reported also that some of them were close fitted. Catulus therefore meeting with some of them going home, after they had giuen their sentence, told them: slyly ye had good reason to be well garded for your safetie, for you were affraid your money should haue bene taken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero sayd vnto Clodius, who reproved him that his wntes was not true he gaue against him: cleane contrary, Cicero for fure and enuery of the Iudges haue beleued me, beeing so many that haue condemned thee, and the thirty would not beleue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingered money. Notwithstanding, in this iudgement Cesar neuer gaue euidence against Clodius: & said moreover, that he did not think his wife had committed any adultery, howbeit that he had put her away, bicause he would that Casars wife should not only be cleane from any dishonesty, but also void of all suspition. Clodius being quit of this accusation and trouble, & hauing also found meanes to be chosen Tribune: he beganne straight to persecute Cicero, chaunging all thinges, and stirring vp all manner of people against him. First he wanne the good will of the common people by deuising of newe lawes which he preferred, for their benefite and commoditie: to both the Consuls he graunted great and large prouinces: vnto Piso, MACEDON, and to Gabinus, SYRIA. He made also many poore men free Citizens, and had alwayes about him a great number of slaues armed. At that present tyme there were three notable men in Rome, which caried all the swaye: Craffus, that shewed him selfe an open enemy vnto Cicero: Pompey the other, made muche both of the one and the selfe: the third was Cesar, who was prepared for his iorney into GAULE with an armie. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knewe him no fast friende of his, and that he mistrusted him for matters past in Castilines conspiracie) and prayed him that he might goe to the warres with him, as one of his Lieutenantes. Cesar graunted him. Thereuppon Clodius perceiuing that by this meanes he got him out of the daunger of his office of Tribuneship for that yeare, he made fayer weather with him (as though he ment to reconcile him selfe vnto him) and tolde him that he had cause rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done against him, then of him selfe, and alwayes spake very courteously of him as occasion fell out, and sayde he did thinke nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a litle grieue him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindnes by his friend. These sweete wordes made Cicero no more affraid, so that he gaue vp his Lieutenancie vnto Cesar, and beganne againe to pleade as he did before. Cesar tooke this in such disdaine, that he hardened Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Pompey his enemy. And Cesar him selfe also sayd before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the rest, vniuently to death, and contrary to lawe, without lawfull tryall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accused. Thereuppon Cicero seeing him selfe accused for this fafte, he chaunged his vsuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and so suffering his beard and heare of his head to growe without any cooing, he went in this humble manner, and sued to the people. But Clodius was euer about him in euery place and streete he went, hauing a sight of raskalls and knaues with him that shamefully mocked him for that he had chaunged his gowne and countenance in that fort, and oftentimes they cast durt and stones at him, breaking his talke and requests he made vnto the people. This notwithstanding, all the knights of Rome did in manner change their gownes with him for companie, and of them there were commonly twenty thousand younge gentlemen of noble house which followed him with their heare about their eares, & were suters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate assembled to decree that the people should mourne in blacks, as in a common calamitie: But the Consuls were against it. And Clodius on thother side was with a band of armed men about the Senate, so that many of the Senators ranne out of the Senat, crying, & tearing their clothes for sorow. Howbeit these men seeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pity and shame: but either Cicero must needs absente him selfe, or els determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreat Pompey to ayde him: But he absented him selfe of purpose out of the citie, because he would not be intreated, and laye at one of his houses in the contry, neare vnto the citie of Alba. So he first of all sent Piso his sonne in lawe vnto him to intreate him, and afterwards went him selfe in person to him. But Pompey being tolde that he was come, had not the harte to suffer him to come to him, to looke him in the face: for he had bene past all shame to haue refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him such pleasure, and also done and sayde so many things in his fauor. Howbeit Pompey being the sonne in lawe of Cesar, did vnfortunately (at his request) forsake him at his neede, vnto whome he was bounde for so many infinite pleasures; as he had receyued of him afore: and therefore when he hearde saye he came to him, he went out at his backe gate and would not speake with him. So Cicero seeing himselfe betrayed of him, and now hauing no other refuge to whome he might repaire vnto: he put him selfe into the handes of the two Consuls. Of them two, Gabinus was euer cruell, and churleshe vnto him. But Piso on thother side spake alwayes very curteously vnto him, and prayed him to absente him selfe for a tyme, and to giue place a litle to Clodius furie, and patiently to beare the chaunge of the tyme: For in so doing, he might come agayne another tyme to be the preferuer of his contry, which was nowe for his sake in tumult and sedition. Cicero vpon this answer of the Consul, consulted with his friends: amonge the which Lucullus gaue him aduise to tary, and sayd that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrary opinion, and would haue him to get him away with speede: for the people would shortly wilhe for him agayne, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius tyrice and folly. Cicero liked best to followe this counsell. Whereuppon hauing had a statue of Minerua a long tyme in his house, the which he greatly reuerenced: he caried her him selfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll with this inscription: Vnto Minerua, Protectrice of Rome. So, his friends hauing giuen him safe conduct, he went out of Rome about midnight, and tooke his way through the contry of Lvs by lande, meaning to goe into Sicile. When it was known in Rome that he was fledde, Clodius did presently banishe him by decree of the people, and caused billes of inhibition to be sette vpp, that no man should secretly receiue him within five hundred myles compasse of Italy. Howbeit diuers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vsed him with all manner of curtesie possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, sauing one citie onely in Lvs, called at that tyme Hippionium, and now Vibone: where a Sicilian called Vibius, (vnto whome Cicero before had done many pleasures, and specially amonge others, had made him Maister of the workes in the year that he was Consul) would not once receiue him into his house, but promised him he would appoynt him a place in the contry that he might goe vnto. And Caius Virgilius also, at that tyme Prætor and gouernor of Sicile, who before had shewed him selfe his very greate friende: wrote E then vnto him, that he should neuer come neare vnto Sicile. This grieved him to the harte. Thereuppon he went directly vnto the citie of Brundisium, and there imbarke to passe ouer the sea vnto Dyrachium, and at the first had winde at will: but when he was in the mayne sea, the winde turned, and brought him backe agayne to the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoysed layle agayne, and the reporte went, that at his arryuall at Dyrachium when he tooke lande, the earth shooke vnder him, and the sea gaue backe together: Whereby the Soothesayers interpreted, that his exile should not be longe, because both the one and the other was a token of chaunge. Yet Cicero, notwithstanding that many men came to see him for the goodwill they bare him, and that the cities of Greece contended who should most honor him, he was alwayes sadde, and could not be merie, but cast his eyes still towards Italy, as passioned louers doe towards the women they loue: shewing him selfe saynt harted, and tooke this aduersitie more basely,

A then was looked for of one so well studied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes praised his friends, not to call him Orator, but rather Philosopher: saying, that Philosophie was his chiefest profession, & that for his eloquence he did not vse it, but as a necessary instrument to one that pleadeh in the common wealth. But glory, and opinion, hath great power to take mans reason from him, even like a culler, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in matters of state, and to make them feele the selfe same passions that common people doe, by daily frequenting their companie: vnles they take great heede of them, and that they come to practise in the common wealth with this resolute minde, to haue to doe with the like matters that the common people haue, but not to entangle them selues with the like passions and moods, by the which their matters doe rise. Nowe Clodius was not contented that he had banished Cicero out of Italy, but further he burnt all his houses in the contry, and his house also in Rome standing in the market place, of the which he built a temple of libertie, and caused his goods to be sold by the cryer: so that the cryer was occupied all daylong crying the goods to be sold, and no man offered to buye any of them. The chiefest men of the citie beginning to be afraid of these violent parts, and hauing the common people at his commaundement, whom he had made very bold and insolent: he beganne to inuey against Pompey, and spake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which euery man els but him self did commend. Pompey then was very angry with him selfe that he had forsaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home agayne from his banishment. Clodius was against it all he could. The Senate notwithstanding with one full consent ordeyned, that nothing should be established for the common wealth, before Cicero's banishment were first repealed. Lentulus was at that tyme Consul, and there grew such an vprore and sturre upon it, that some of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was slayne and hidden vnder the deade bodies. Then the people beganne to chaunge their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the first man that durst venter vpon Clodius, and bringe him by force to be tryed before the Iudges. Pompey him selfe also hauing gotten a great number of men about him, awell of the citie of Rome as of other townes adioyning to it, beeing strongly garded with them: he came out of his house, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to giue their voyces, for the calling home agayne of Cicero. It is reported D that the people neuer passed thinge with so great good will, nor so wholly together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their partes also, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordeyned that the cities which had honored and receiued Cicero in his exile, should be greatly commended: and that his houses which Clodius had ouerthrowen and rased, should be reedified at the charge of the common wealth. So Cicero returned the sixteenth moneth after his banishment, and the townes and cities he came by, shewed them selues so ioyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honor him, with so great loue and affection, that Cicero's reporte thereof afterwards came in deede short of the very truth as it was. For he sayde, that Italy brought him into Rome vpon their shoulders. Insomuch as *Cras-*sus him selfe, who before his banishment was his enemy, went then with very good will vnto him, and became his friende, saying: that he did it for the loue of his sonne, who loued Cicero with all his hart. Nowe Cicero being returned, he found a tyme when Clodius was out of the citie, and went with a good companie of his friendes vnto the Capitoll, and there tooke away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his actes that he had passed and done in the tyme of his Tribuneship. Clodius would afterwarde haue accused Cicero for it: But Cicero answered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, because he was of the Patricians, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneship was voyde, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and spake against him, not for that he liked any of Clodius doings: (but to the contrary, vtterly misliked all that he did) but because he thought it out of all reason, that the Senate shoulde cancell all those thinges which he had done and passed in his Tribuneship, and specially, because amongst the rest that was there which he him selfe had done in the Ile of Cyperus, and in the citie of Byzantium. Hereuppon there grew some straugenes betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithstanding brake not out to open enmitie: but onely to an abstinence of their wonted familiaritie, and access to one to another. Shortly after, Milo the Clodius. Milo being accused of murder, prayed Cicero to plead his cause. The Senate fearing that this accusation of Milo, (who was a hardie man, and of quality besides) would moue some fedition and vprore in the citie: they gaue commission to Pompey to see iustice executed aswell in this cause, as in other offences, that the citie might be quiet, and iudgement also executed with safetie. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the highest places of the market place, by his souldiers that were armed, whome he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero would bee affraied to see such a number of earnest men about him, being no vsuall matter, and that it might peradventure hinder him to plead his cause well: he prayed him he would come betymes in the morning in his litter into the market place, and there to stave the coming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timorous also in pleading. For in deede he neuer beganne to speake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the best prooffe and perfection, he neuer left his trembling and timoroulnes. In such that pleading a case for Mutius Surenus (accused by Cato, struing to excell Hortensius, whose pleading was very well thought of: he tooke no rest all night, and what through watching, and the trouble of his minde he was not very well, so that he was not so well liked for his pleading, as Hortensius. So, going to defend Milo's cause, when he came out of his litter, and sawe Pompey set aloft as if he had bene in a campe, and the market place compassed about with armed men, glistering in euery corner: it so amated him, that he could scant facion him selfe to speake, all the partes of him did so quake and tremble, and his voyce could not come to him. But Milo on the other side stood boldly by him him selfe, without any feare at all of the iudgement of his cause, neither did he let his heere growe, as other men accused did: neither did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it seemed) one of the chiefe causes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timoroulnes of Cicero came rather of the goodwill he bare vnto his friends, then of any cowardly minde of him selfe. He was also chosen one of the Priestes of the Soothesayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of P. Crassus the younger, who was slayne in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwardes, the prouince of CILICIA being appoynted to him, with an armie of twelue thousand footemen, and two thousand sixe hundred horsemen, he tooke the sea to goe thither. So when he was arriued there, he brought CAPPADOCIA agayne into the subiection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes according to his commission and commaundement giuen by the Senate: moreover, both there and elsewhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuised, in reducing of thinges to quietnes, without warres. Furthermore, finding that the *CILICIAN*s were grown somewhat stowt and vnruely, by the ouerthrowe the *ROMAN*s had of the *PARTHIAN*s, and by reason of their rising and rebellion in SYRIA: he brought them vnto reason by gentle perswasions, and neuer receiued giftes that were sent him, no nor from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the prouinces of the feastes and bankets they were wont to make other gouernors before him. On the other side also, he would euer haue the company of good and learned men at his table, and would vse them well, without curiositie and excefte. He had neuer porter to his gate, nor was seene by any man in his bed: For he would alwayes rise at the breake of daye, and would walke or stande before his dore. He would courteously receiue all them that came to salute and visite him. Further they report of him, that he neuer caused man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reuiled any man, neither did dispitefully set fire vpon any mans heade. Finding many thinges also belonging to the common wealth, which priuate men had stollen and imbecelled to their owne vse: he restored them agayne vnto the cities, whereby they grewe very riche and wealthie: and yet did he saue their honor and credit that had taken them away, and did them no other hurte, but onely constrayned them to restore that which was the common wealthes. He made a litle warre also, and draue away the theues that kept about the Mountayne F Amanus, for the which exployte his souldiers called him Imperator, to saie, chiefe Capraine. About that tyme there was an Orator called Catulus, who wrote vnto him from

from ROME, to praye him to sende him some Leopers, or Panthers out of CILICIA, bicause he would shewe the people some pastyme with them. Cicero boasting of his doings, wrote to him agayne, that there were no more Leopers in CILICIA, but that they were all fledde into CARIA for anger, that seeing all thinges quiet in CILICIA, they had leasure now to hunt them. So when he returned towards ROME, from the charge of his government, he came by RHODES: and stayed a few dayes at ATHENS, with great delight, to remember how pleasantly he liued there before, at what time he studied there. Thither came to him the chiefe learned men of the citie, and his frendes also, with whom he was acquainted at his first being there. In fine, hauing receiued all the honorable entertainment in GABRIA that could be: he returned vnto ROME, where at his arriual he found great factions kindled, by the which men saw plainly would growe in the ende to ciuill warre. Thereupon the Senate hauing decreed that he should enter in triumphe into the citie: he answered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Casars coche in triumphe. So he trauelled verie earnestly betwene Pompey and Cesar, els soones wrying vnto Cesar, and also speaking vnto Pompey that was present, seeking all the meanes he coule, to take vp the quarrell and misliking betwixt them two. But it was so impossible a matter, that there was no speeche of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cesar was not farre from ROME, he durst no longer abide in ROME, but fled with diuers of the greatest men in ROME. Cicero would not followe him when he fled, and therefore men thought he would take parte with Cesar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruelous perplexitie, and could not easily determine what way to take. Whereupon he wrote in his Epistells: what way should I take? Pompey hath the iuster and honeste cause of warre, but Cesar can better execute, and prouide for him selfe and his frendes with better safetie: so that I haue meanes enow to flie, but none to whome I might repaire. In all this sturre, there was one of Casars frendes called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cesar wished him in any case to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vnderooke: but if he excused him selfe by his age, that then he should get him into GABRIA, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero marveling that Cesar wrote not to him him selfe, answered in anger, that he would doe nothing vnworthie of his actes all the dayes of his life thitherto: & to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cesar being gone into SPAYNE, Cicero imbarcked immediatly to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man was very glad of his coming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato secretly reproued him for comming vnto Pompey, saying: that for him selfe he had bene without all honestie at that time to haue forsaken that parte, the which he had alwayes taken and followed from the beginning of his first practise in the common wealth: but for him on thother side, that it had bene better for the safetie of his contrie, and chiefly for all his frendes, that he had bene a newter to both, and so to haue taken thinges as they had fallen out: and that he had no manner of reason nor instant cause to make him to become Casars enemy, and by comming thither to put him selfe into so great perill. These perswasions of Cato ouerthrew all Cicero's purpose and determination, besides that Pompey him selfe did not employe him in any matter of seruice or importance. But hereof him selfe was more in fault then Pompey, bicause he confessed openly that he did E repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he scorned and disdained all Pompey's preparations and counsells, the which in deede made him to be had in gealouse and suspition. Also he would euer be fleeing and gybing at those that tooke Pompey's parte, though he had no liff him selfe to be merie. He would also goe vp and downe the campe very sad and heauy, but yet he would euer haue one geast or other to make men laugh, although they had as litle lust to be merie as he: and surely, it shall doe no hurte to call some of them to minde in this place. Domitius being verie desirous to preferre a gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommende him, he sayd he was an honest, wise, and sober man. Whereunto Cicero presently answered. Why doest thou not kepe him then to bring vp thy children? An other time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was master of all the artificers of the campe) F bicause he had notable comforted the *RHODIAN*s when they had receiued a greates losse of their nauy: see, sayd Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to haue a GRÆCIAN, master of artificers in the campe? When both battells came to ioine together, and that Cesar had in manner all the aduantage, & kept them as good as besieged: Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard A say all Cæsars frendes were madde, and melancholy men. Why, q Cicero to him againe: doest thou say that they doe enuie Cæsar? An other called Martius, comming lately out of ITALIE, sayd, that there ranne a rumor in ROME, that Pompey was besieged. What, q Cicero to him againe: and diddest thou take shippe to come and see him thy selfe, because thou mightest beleue it, when thou haddest seene it? Pompey being ouerthrowen, one Nonius sayed there was yet good hope left, because they had taken seuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perswasion were not ill, q Cicero, so we were to fight but with pyes or daves. Labeius repoled all his trust in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of necessitie must haue the vpper hand. Yea sayd Cicero, but for all this goodly stratageme of warre, we haue not longe since lost our whole campe. After the battell of Pharsalia, where Cicero was not by reason of his sickenesse: Pompey being fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIUM, where he had gathered a great number of men of warre, & had also prepared a great nauie: he prayed Cicero to take charge of all this army, as it perteyned vnto him, hauing bene Consul. Cicero did not only refuse it, but also tolde them he would meddle no more with this warre. But this was enough to haue made him bene slaine: for the younger Pompey and his frendes called him traitor, and drew their swordes vpon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato stepped betwene them and him, and yet had he muche a doe to saue him, and to conuey him safely out of the campe. When Cicero came to BRINDISIUM, he stayed there a certaine time for Cæsars comming, who came but slowly, by reason of his troubles he had in ASIA, as also in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes being brought at length that Cæsar was arrived at TARENTUM, and that he came by lande vnto BRINDISIUM: Cicero departed thence to goe meete him, not mistrusting that Cæsar would not pardon him, but rather being ashamed to come to his enemie being a conqueror, before such a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to doe or speake any thing vnseemely to his calling. For Cæsar seeing him comming towards him farre before the rest that came with him: he lighted from his horse and embraced him, and walked a great way a foote with him, still talking with him only, and euer after he did him great honor and made much of him. Insomuche as Cicero hauing written a booke in praise of Cato: Cæsar on the other side wrote an other, and praised the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramenes. Ciceroes booke was intituled Cato, & Cæsars booke called Anticato, as much to say, as against Cato. They say further, that Quintus Ligarius being accused to haue bene in the field against Cæsar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cause: and that Cæsar sayd vnto his frendes about him, what hurte is it for vs to heare Cicero speake, whome we haue not heard of long time? For otherwise Ligarius (in my opinion) standeth already a condemned man, for I know him to be a vile man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begonne his Oration, he moued Cæsar maruelously, he had so sweete a grace, and suche force in his words: that it is reported Cæsar chaunged diuers colours, and shewed plainly by his countenance, that there was a maruelous alteration in all the partes of him. For, in thend when the Orator came to touche the battell of Pharsalia, then was Cæsar so troubled, that his bodie shooke withall, and besides, certaine bookes he had, fell out of his handes, and he was driuen against his will to let Ligarius at libertie. Afterwardes, when the common wealth of ROME came to be a kingdom, Cicero leauing to practise any more in the state, he gaue him selfe to reade Philosophie to the young men that came to heare him: by whose access vnto him (because they were the chieft of the nobilitie in ROME) he came againe to beare as great sway and authoritie in ROME, as euer he had done before. His studie and endeuour was, to wryte matters of Philosophie dialogue wise, and to translate out of Græke into Latin, taking paynes to bring all the Græke wordes, which are proper vnto logicke and naturall causes, vnto Latin. For he was the first man by report that gaue Latin names vnto these Græke wordes, which are proper vnto Philosophers, as συνεπείρα, he termed, Visio, κατὰ δυνάμιν Assensus, εὐχρηστος, Assensus cohibito, κατὰ λόγον Comprehensio, τὸ ἀτόνους Corpus indiuiduum, τὸ διμερές Corpus simplex, τὸ αὐτοὺν Vacuum, and many other suchelike wordes. But though he were not the first, yet was it he that most did deuise and vse them, and turned some of them by translation, others into proper termes: so that at length they came to be well taken, knowne, and vnderstanded of euerie man. And for his readinesse in in wryting of verses, he would vse them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whensoever he tooke in hand to make any, he would dispatch five hundred of them in a night. Nowe, all that time of his recreation and pleasure, he would commonly be at some of his houses in the contrie, which he had nere vnto THYREVS, from whence he would wryte vnto his frends, that he led Zaertes life: either spoken merily as his manner was, or else pricked forward with ambition, desiring to returne againe to be a practiser in the common wealth, being wearie with the present time and state thereof. Howsoeuer it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, onely to see Cæsar to keepe him his frend, and would euer be the first man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, and was alwayes studious to vter some newe matter to praise him and his doings. As that was he sayd touching the statues of Pompey, the which being ouerthrowen, Cæsar commaunded them to be set vp againe, and so they were. For Cicero sayd, that by that curtesie in setting vp of Pompeys statues againe, he did establish his owne. So, Cicero being determined to wryte all the ROMANE historie, and to mingle with them many of the GRÆCIANS doings, adding thereunto all the fables and deuises which they doe wryte and reporte: he was hindered of his purpose against his will, by many open and priuate troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof notwithstanding he him selfe was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, because she had made but small account of him in all the warres: so that he departed from ROME hauing no necessarie thing with him to entertaine him out of his contrie, and yet when he came backe againe into ITALIE, the neuer shewed any sparke of loue or good will towards him. For the neuer came to BRINDISIUM to him, where he remeyned a long time: and worse then that, his daughter hauing the hart to take so long a iorney in hand to goe to him, the neither gaue her company to conduct her, nor money or other furniture conuenient for her, but so handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to ROME founde bare walles in his house and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in det besides. And these were the honestest causes alleaged for their diuorfe. But besides that Terentia denyed all these, Cicero him selfe gaue her a good occasion to cleere her selfe, because he shortly after married a young maiden, being fallen in fancie with her (as Terentia sayd) for her beawtie: or, as Tyro his seruant wrote, for her riches, to thende that with her goods he might pay his det. For she was very rich, & Cicero also was appointed her gardian, the being left sole heire. Now, because he oughra maruelous summe of money, his parents and frends did counsell him to marry this young maiden, notwithstanding he was too olde for her, because that with her goodes he might satisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this marriage of Cicero, in his aunswers & Orations he made against the *PHILIPPIAN*s: he doth reprove him for that he put away his wife, with whome he was growen olde, being merie with him by the way for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the smoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroad in the warres in any seruice of his contrie or common wealth. Shortly after that he had married his second wife, his daughter dyed in labor of child, in Lentulus house, whose seconde wife she was, being before married vnto Piso, who was her first husband. So the Philosophers and learned men came of all sides to comfort him: but he tooke her death so sorrowfully, that he put away his second wife, because he thought she did reioyce at the death of his daughter. And thus muche touching the state and troubles of his house. Nowe touching the conspiracie against Cæsar, he was not made priue to it, although he was one of Brutus greatest frendes, and that it grieved him to see thinges in that state they were brought vnto, and albeit also he wished for the time past, as much as any other man did. But in deede the conspirators were affrayed of his nature, that lacked hardinesse: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the stowtest and most hardiest natures, faint harted & cowardly. Notwithstanding, the conspiracie being executed by Brutus and Cassius, Cæsars frendes being gathered together, euerie man was affrayed that the citie would againe fall into ciuill warres. And Antonius also, who was Consul at that time, did assemble the Senate, and made some speache and mocion then to draw thinges againe vnto quiemes. But Cicero hauing vied diuers perswasions fit for the time, in the end he moued the Senate to decree (following the example of the *ATHENIAN*s) a generall obliuion of thinges done against Cæsar, and to assigne vnto Brutus and Cassius some gouernmentes of prouinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded:

for the people of them felues were forie, when they sawe Cesar's bodie brought through the A market place. And when Antonius also did shew them his gowne all bebloodied, cut, & throwe through with swordes: then they were like madde men for anger, and sought vp and downe the market place if they coulde meete with any of them that had slaine him: and taking fire brandes in their handes, they ranne to their houses to set them a fire. But the conspirators hauing preuented this daunger, saued them selues: and fearing that if they taried at Rome, they should haue many such alarms, they forsooke the cite. Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he ment to make him selfe king: but yet most of all vnto Cicero, aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increafe in credit and authoritie, and knowing that he was Brutus very frend; he did milke to see him come neere him, and besides, there was at that time some gealousie betwixt them, for the B diuersitie and difference of their manners and dispositions. Cicero being affrayed of this, was fust of all in minde to go with Dolabella, to his prouince of Syria, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Consuls the next year following after Antonius, two noble citizens, & Cicero's great frends, Hircius, & Pansa: they intreated him not to forsake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouergreat power of Antonius, so he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleuing nor altogether mistrusting them, forsooke Dolabella, and promised Hircius and Pansa, that he would spend the sommer at Athenes, and that he would returne againe to Rome so soone as they were entred into their Consulship. With this determination Cicero tooke sea alone, to goe into Greece. But as it chaunceth oftentimes, there was some let that kept him he could not faile, and newes came to him daily from Rome, as the manner is, that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authoritie & consent of the Senate, & that there lacked no thing but his person, to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his dastardly feare, returned forthwith to Rome, not being deceiued in his first hope. For there came such a number of people out to meete him, that he could do nothing all day long, but take them by the handes, and embrace them: who to honor him, came to meete him at the gate of the cite, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius assembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refused to goe, and kept his bedde, saying that he was werie with his iorney and paines he had taken the day before: but in deede, the cause why he went not, was, for feare and suspicion of an ambushe that was layed for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his verie good frends. Antonius was maruelously offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying of any ambush for him: and therefore sent souldiers to his house, and commanded them to bring him by force, or else to sette his house a fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwayes at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heede of another: vntill that the young Cesar returning from the cite of Apollonia, came as lawfull heire vnto Julius Cesar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the summe of two thousande fine hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his handes of his fathers goodes. Thereupon, Philip who had married the mother of this young Cesar, and Marcellus, who had also married his sister, went with young Cesar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero should helpe young Cesar with the fauour of his authoritie, E and eloquence, as well towards the Senate, as also to the people: and that Cesar in recompence of his good will should stande by Cicero, with his money and souldiers. For this young Cesar, had many of his fathers old souldiers about him, that had serued vnder him. Now there was an other cause that made Cicero glad to embrace the frendshippe of this young Cesar, and that was this. Whilist Pompey and Julius Cesar were aliue, and in good case: Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators sonnes were called into the Capitoll, because Iupiter had appointed to shew them him, that one day should come to be Lord and king of Rome, and that the Romanes being desirous to see who it should be, ranne all vnto the temple: and that all the children likewise were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntill that suddenly the dores of the temple were open, & then that all the children rose one after another, F & went and passed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and sent them discontented, sauing this young Cesar, vnto whom he put forth his hand as he passed by, and sayd:

My

A My Lordes of Rome, this childe is he that shall end all your ciuill warres, when he commeth to be Lord of Rome. Some say, that Cicero had this vision in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this childe, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpose into the fieldes of Mars, where these young boyes did exercise them selues, who, when he came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home, and that amongst them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him verie well, and musing at him the more, asked him whose sonne he was. The boy answered, that he was the sonne of one Octavius, (a man otherwise of no great calling) & of Accia, the sister of Julius Cesar: who hauing no childe, made him his heire by his last will and testament, and left him all his landes and goodes. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was verie glad to speake to B him when he met with him, and that the boy also liked Cicero's frendshippe, and making of him: for by good happe the boy was borne the same yeare that Cicero was Consul. And these be the reasons alleaged, why Cicero did fauor this young Cesar. But in truth, first of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, and secondly his nature that was ambitious of honor, were (in my opinion) the chiefest causes why he became young Cesar's friend: knowing that the force and power of his souldiers, would greatly strengthen his authority and countenance in managing the affaires of the state, besides that the young man coulde flatter him so well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistells he wrote vnto Atticus, he sharply reproveth Cicero, saying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this young Cesar: whereby it appeared, he did not so much seeke for the libertie of Rome, as he did procure him selfe a louing and gentle maister. This notwithstanding, Brutus brought with him Cicero's sonne that studied Philosophie at Athenes, and gaue him charge of men vnder him, and employed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed him selfe verie forward, and valliant. Now Cicero's authoritie and power grew againe to be so great in Rome, as euer it was before. For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the cite, and sent the two Consuls Hircius and Pansa against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that young Cesar should haue sergeants to carie rodde and axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prator, as a man that fighteth for his contry. After that Antonius had lost the battell, and that both the Consuls were slaine, both the armies came vnto Cesar. The Senate then being affrayed of this young man, that had so great good fortune, they D practised by honors and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and so to minish the greatnes of his power: saying, that their contrie now stood in no neede of force, nor feare of defence, sith her enemy Antonius was fled and gone. Cesar fearing this, sent men secretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls, and that when they should be in office, he should doe and appoint what he thought good, hauing the young man at his commaundement, who desired no more but the honor only of the name. Cesar him selfe confessed afterwarde, that being affrayed he should haue bene vterly cast away, to haue bene left alone: he finely serued his turne by Cicero's ambition, hauing perswaded him to require the Consulship, through the helpe and assistance that he would geue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was contented to sue for the Consulship in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherefore his frends presently reproveth him for it, and shortly after he perceiued he had vndone him selfe, and together also lost the libertie of his contrie. For this young man Octavius Cesar being grown to be verie great by his meanes and procurement: when he saw that he had the Consulship vpon him, he forsooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his armie with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betwene them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be slaine. But the greatest difficultie and difference that fell out betwene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius woulde hearken to no peace betwene them, vnlesse Cicero were slaine first of all: Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antonius: but Cesar was against them both. Their meeting was by the cite of Bolonia, where they continued three dayes together, they three only secretly consulting in a place enuironned about with a litle riuer. the two first dayes, but at the third, that he yeelded and forooke him. The exchange they agreed vpon betwene them, was this. Cæsar forooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus and Antonius, Lucius Cæsar, his vncl by the mothers side. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kintred nor blood, and to speake more properly, they shewed that no brute or sauage beast is so cruell as man, if with his licentiousnes he haue liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the contrie, by the city of THVSCLVM, hauing at home with him also his brother Quintus Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be slaine: they determined to goe to ASTYRA, a place by the sea side where Cicero had an other house, there to take sea, and from thence to goe into MACEDON vnto Brutus. For there ran a rumor that Brutus was verie strong, and had a great power. So, they caused them selues to be conueyed thither in two litters, both of them being so weake with sorow and griefe, that they could not otherwise haue gone their wayes. As they were on their waye, both their litters going as neere to ech other as they could, they bewailed their miserable estate: but Quintus chiefly, who tooke it most grieuouly. For, remembering that he tooke no money with him when he came from his house, and that Cicero his brother also had verie litle for him selfe: he thought it best that Cicero shoulde holde on his iorney, whilst he him selfe made an arrant home to fetch the fuche thinges as he lacked, and so to make haft againe to ouertake his brother. They both thought it best so, and then tenderly embracing one another, the teares falling from their eyes, they tooke leaue of ech other. Within few dayes after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his owne seruauents, vnto them that made search for him: he was cruelly slaine, and his sonne with him. C But Marcus Tullius Cicero being caried vnto ASTYRA, and there finding a shippe readie, embarked immediatly, and sayled alongest the coast vnto mount Corce, hauing a good gale of winde. There the mariners determining forthwith to make sayle againe, he came a shore, either for feare of the sea, or for that he had some hope that Cæsar had not altogether forsaken him: and therewithall returning towards Rome by lande, he had gone about a hundred furlong thence. But then being at a straight howe to resolute, and sodainly changing his minde: he woulde needes be caried backe againe to the sea, where he continued all night maruelous sorowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in minde to goe secretly vnto Octavius Cæsar's house, & to kill him selfe by the heareth of his chimney, to make the furies of hell to reuenge his blood: but being affraied to be intercepted by the way, & cruelly handled, he turned from that determination. Then falling into other vnadvised determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put him selfe againe into his seruauents hands, to be conueyed by sea to another place called * CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleasaunt sommer house, where the North winds, called Etesia, doe geue a trimme fresh ayer in the sommer season. In that place also there is a litle temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the sea side. From thence there came a great shole of crows, making a maruelous noyse, that came flying towards Cicero's shippe, which rowed vpon the shore side. This shole of crows came and lighted vpon the yarde of their saile, some crying, and some pecking the cords with their bills: so that euery man iudged fraight, that this was a signe of ill lucke at hand. Cicero notwithstanding this, came a shore, and went into his house, and layed him downe to see if he coulde sleepe. But the most parte of these crows came and lighted vpon the chamber windowe where he lay, making a wonderfull great noyse: and some of them got vnto Cicero's bedde where he lay, the clothes being cast ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their bills plucked of the clothes that couered his face. His men seeing that, & saying to them selues that they were too vile beasts, if they would tarie to see their maister slaine before their eyes, considering that brute beasts had care to saue his life, seeing him so vnworthily intreated, and that they should not doe the best they coulde to saue his life: partly by intreatie, and partly by force, they put him againe into his litter to carie him to the sea. But in the meane time came the murderers appointed to kill him, Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Lena, Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousande men, whose cause Cicero had once pleaded before the Iudges, when he was accused for the murder of his owne father) hauing souldiers attending vpon them. So Cicero's gate being furth, they entred the house by force, and missing him, Herennius, & Popilius, sent to kill M. T. Cicero.

A they asked them of the house what was become of him. They answered they could not tell. Howbeit there was a young boy in the house called Philologus, a slave instructed by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the Latin tongue, and had taught him the liberal sciences: he told this Herennius, that his seruauents caried him in a litter towards the sea, through darke narrowe lanes, shadowed with widdes on either side. Popilius the Colonell taking some souldiers with him, ranne about on the outside of the house to see him at his coming out of them: and Herennius on the other side entered the lanes. Cicero hearing him coming, commaunded his men to set downe his litter, and taking his beard in his left hande, as his manner was, he slowly looked the murderers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane & wrinkled, for the extreame sorowes he had taken. Iudges of them that were by, helde their hands before their eyes, whilst Herennius did cruelly murder him. So Cicero being three score and foure yeares of age, thrust his necke out of the litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commaundement, and his hands also, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cicero call the Orations he wrote against him, for the malice he bare him: & do yet continue the same name vntill this present time. When these poore dismembred members were brought to Rome, Antonius by chance was busily occupied at that time about the election of certaine officers: who when he heard of them & saw them, he cried out alowde that now all his outlawries and proscriptions were executed: and thereupon commaunded his head and his hands should straight be set vp ouer the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. This was a fearefull and horrible sight vnto the Romans, who thought they saw not Cicero's face, but an image of Antonius' life and disposition: who among to many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act only that had some shew of goodnes, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the hands of Pomponius, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when she had him, besides other cruell tormentes she made him abide, she compelled him to cut his owne flesh off by litle morsells, and so boyle them, and then to eate them. Some historiographers doe thus reporte it. But Tyro who was a slave, enfranchised by Cicero, made no mention of the treason of this Philologus. Howbeit I vnderstande that Cæsar Augustus, long time after that, went one day to see one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hande of Cicero's: and he fearing least his Vncl would be angrie to finde that booke in his handes, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cæsar saw it, and tooke it from him, and red the most parte of it standing, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and sayd vnto him: he was a wise man in deede, my childe, and loued his contrie well. After he had slaine Antonius, being Consul: he made Cicero's sonne his colleague and fellow Consul with him, in whose time the Senate ordeyned, that the images of Antonius should be thrown downe, and deprived his memory of all other honors: adding further vnto his decree, that from thence forth none of the house & familie of the Antony should euer after beare the christen name of Marcus. So, Gods iustice made the extreame reuenge and punishment of Antonius to fall into the house of Cicero.

THE COMPARISON OF Cicero with Demosthenes.

eloquence.

Cicero's

demeanour.

His as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable acts and deeds worthy of memorie, written of Cicero and Demosthenes. Furthermore, leaving the comparison of a side of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations: me thinks I may say thus much of them. That Demosthenes did wholly employ all his wit and learning (natural or artificial) vnto the arte of Rhetoricke, and that in force, and vertue of eloquence, he did excell all the Orators in his time: and for grauitie and magnificent style, all those also that onely wryte for shewe or ostentation: and for sharpnesse and arte, all the Sophisters and Maisters of Rhetoricke. And that Cicero was a man generally learned in all sciences, and that had studied diuers bookes, as appeareth plainly by the sundrie bookes of Philosophie of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philosophers. Furthermore, they may see in his Orations he wrote in certaine causes to serue him when he pleaded: that he sought occasions in his byrtales to shewe men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phrases a man may discern some sparke of their manners and condicions. For Demosthenes phrase hath no maner of finenesse, geastes, nor grace in it, but is altogether graue and harsh, and smelleth not of the lampe, as Pytheas sayd when he mocked him: but sheweth a great drinker of water, extreme paines, and therewith also a sharpe and sower nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleasaunt tawntes, vnto plaine scurrillie: and turning all his pleadings of matters of importance, to sporte and laughter, hauing a grace in it, many times he did forget the comlynesse that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Calpurnius, where he sayeth, it is no maruell if in so greate abundance of wealth and finenesse he giue him selfe litle to take his pleasure: and that it was a folly not to vse pleasures lawefull, and tollerable, sith the famous Philosophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicitie of man, to be in pleasure. And it is reported also, that Marcus Cato hauing accused Marcellus, Cicero being Consul, defended his cause, and in his Oration pleasauntly girded all the sect of the Stoicke Philosophers for Catoes sake, for the straunge opinions they holde, which they call Paradoxes: infomuch as he made all the people and Iudges also fall a laughing a good. And Cato him selfe also smiling a litle, sayd vnto them that sate by him: what a laughing and mocking Consul haue we, my Lordes? but letting that passe, it seemeth that Cicero was of a pleasaunt and merie nature: for his face shewed euer greate life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demosthenes countenance on thother side, they might discern a maruelous diligence & care, and a pensifue man, neuer weary with paine: infomuch that his enemies, (as he reporteth him selfe) called him a peruerse & froward man. Furthermore, in their writings

DEMOSTHENES and CICERO.

As is discerned, that the one speaketh modestly in his owne praise, so as no man can iustly be offended with him: and yet not alwayes, but when necessitie enforceth him for some matter of great importance, but otherwise verie discrete and modest to speake of him selfe. Cicero in contrarie maner, vsing too often repetition of one selfe thing in all his Orations, shewed an extreame ambition of glorie, when incessantly he cried out:

Let speare and shield geue place to gouerne, And geue the tung the laurell Crowne.

Yea furthermore, he did not onely praise his owne actes and deedes, but the Orations also which he had wrytten or pleaded: as if he shoulde haue contended against Iocrates, or Anaximenes, a maister that taught Rhetoricke, and not to goe about to reforme the people of

B ROME:

VVhich vvere both fierce and stout in armes, And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

For, as it is requisite for a Gouernour of a common wealth to seeke authoritie by his eloquence: so, to couet the praise of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that sheweth a base minde. And therefore in this point we must confesse that Demosthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler minde: who declared him selfe, that all his eloquence came onely but by practise, the which also required the fauor of his auditors: and further, he thought them fooles and madde men (as in deede they be no lesse) that therefore would make any boast of them selues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit and authoritie in their Orations to the people, and for obtaeyning that they would propound: Infomuch as Captaines, and they that had armies in their handes, stood in neede of their eloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, and Leosthenes, they all were holpen of Demosthenes: and Pompey, and Octavianus Caesar the young man, of Cicero: as Caesar him selfe confesseth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa, and Marcenas. But nothing sheweth a mans nature and condicion more, (as it is reported, and so is it true) then when one is in authoritie: for that bewrayeth his humor, and the affections of his minde, and layeth open also all his secret vices in him. Demosthenes coulde neuer deliuer any such proofe of him selfe, because he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward. For he was not Generall of the armie, which he him selfe had prepared against king Philippe, Cicero on thother side being sent Treasurer into Sicilie, and Proconsul into Cilicia and Cappadocia, in such a time as couetousnes reigned most: (infomuch that the Captaines & Gouernours whom they sent to gouerne their prouinces, thinking it villanic and dastardinesse to robbe, did violently take thinges by force, at what time also to take bribes was reckoned no shame, but to handle it discretely, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it) he shewed plainly that he regarded not money, and gaue forth many proofes of his curtesie and goodnes. Furthermore, Cicero being created Consul by name, but Dictator in deede, hauing absolute power and authoritie ouer all thinges to suppress the rebellion and conspirators of Catiline: he proued Platoes propheticke true, which was: That the cities are safe from daunger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernours (by some good diuine fortune) doe gouerne with wisdom and iustice. Demosthenes was reproued for his corruption, and selling of his eloquence: because secretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, and another in the selfe same matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduersaries. Further, he was defamed also for receiuing money of the king of Persia, and therewithall condemned for the money which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture would obiect, that the reporters thereof (which are many) doe lye: yet they can not possibly deny this, that Demosthenes had no power to refrain from looking of the presentes which diuers kings did offer him, praying him to accept them in good parte for their sakes: neither was that the part of a man that did take vsurie by trafficke on the sea, the extreamest yet of all other. In contrarie maner (as we haue sayd before) it is certaine that Cicero being Treasurer, refused the gifts which the Sicilianians offered him, there: and the presentes also which the king of the Cappadocians offered him whilst he was Proconsul in Cilicia, and those especially which his frendes pressed vpon him to take of them, being a great summe of money, when he went as a banished man out of Rome. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, because by iudgement he was banished as a theefe. The banishment of the other was for as A honorable an acte as euer he did, being banished for ridding his contrie of wicked men. And therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speeche after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate chaunged their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passe no decree by their authoritie, before Ciceroes banishment was reuoked by the people. In deede Cicero idly passed his time of banishment, and did nothing all the while he was in MACEDON: and one of the chiefeſt acts that Demosthenes did, in all the time that he delt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment. For he went vnto euery city, and did assist the Ambassadors of the GRÆCIANS, and refused the Ambassadors of the MACEDONIANS. In the which he shewed him selfe a better citizen, then either Themistocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell againe to his old trade which he B practised before, and was euer against Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS. Where Laelius in open Senate sharply tooke vp Cicero, for that he ſate still and sayd nothing, when that Octavius Cæſar the young man made petition against the law, that he might sue for the Consulshippe, and being so young, that he had neuer a heare on his face. And Brutus selfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished, a more grieuous and greater tyrannie, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero most pitiefull, to see an olde man caried vp and downe, (with tender loue of his fer-uantes) seeking all the waies that might be to ſie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the ende, olde as he was, to see his head so pitiefully cut of. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a litle, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had C prepared the poyſon long before, that he had kept it long, and also vſed it as he did, he can not but be maruelously commended for it. For ſith the god Neptune denyed him the benefit of his ſanctuarie, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he ſaued him selfe out of the ſouldiers hands of the tyran, and also ſcorned the bloody crueltie of Antipater.

THE LIFE OF Demetrius.

A WHo first likened arts to our senses, seemeth to haue respected especially that one property of them both, in receiuing obiects of contrary quality: for, in the vie & end of their operation, there is great difference. The senses receiue indifferently, without discretion and iudgement, white and blacke, sweete and lower, soft and hard: for their office is only to admit their feuerall obiects, and to carie and referre the iudgement thereof to the common sense.
But artes being the perfection of reason, receiue and allow those things onely which make for their operation, regarding & elchuing the contraries. Thone chiefly, and for vie: thother by the way, and with intent to auoyde them. So Philosophie dealet with diseases, B Musicke with discordes, to theend to remoue them, and worke their contraries, and the great Ladies of all other artes. Temperaunce, iustice, and wisdom, doe not only consider honestie, vprightnes, and profit: but examine withall, the nature and effectes of lewdnes, corruption, and damage.
And innocencie, which vaunteth her want of experience in vndue practises: men call simplicitie, and ignorance of thinges, that be necessarie and good to be knowne. And therefore the auncient LACEDÆMONIANS in their solemne feastes forced their yong men, to ouercharge them selues with wine: and ſuche they shewed them vnto their youth, by the apparant beallines of dronken men, to worke in them an abhorring of so lothesome vice. Wherin, although I can not much praise them for humanity or wisdom, that corrupt and spoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime an other: yet (as I hope) C it shall not be reprehended in me, if amongst the rest I put in one or two paiers of ſuche, as liuing in great place & accompt, haue increased their fame with infamy. Which in truth, I doe not, to please & draw on the reader with variety of report: but as Ismerius the THEBAN Musitian shewed his schollers, both those that strake a cleane stroke, with, do so, & such as bungled it, with, do not so: & Antigenidas thought men should like better, & with greater desire to tend for skill, if they heard and discerned vtunable notes: so thinke I, we shall be the forwarder in reading & following the good, if we know the liues, and see the deformity of the wicked. This treaty containeth the liues of Demetrius, surnamed the Fortgainer, & M. Antony the Triumuir, & great examples to confirme the saying of Plato: That from great minds, both great vertues & great vices do procede. They were both giuen ouer to women & wine, both valliant & liberal, both sumptuous & high minded, fortune serued them both alike, not only in the course of their lives, in attempting great matters, sometimes with good, sometimes with ill success, in getting & A losing things of great consequence, overthrowing both when they feared not, restoring both when they hoped not. But also in their end there was no great difference, thone brought to his death by his mortal enemies, & the others fortune not much unlike. But now to our historie. Antigonus had two sonnes by his wife Symone, the daughter of Corraeus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip after his fathers name. Thus farre the most wyters doe agree: howbeit some holde opinion, that Demetrius was not the sonne of Antigonus, but his Nephewe. But because his father dyed leaving him a childe, and that his mother was straight married againe vnto Antigonus: thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus sonne. Howsoever it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demetrius, dyed. Now for Demetrius, though he was a verie bigge man, he was nothing so high as his father, but yet so passing and wonderfull fayer, that no painter could possibly draw his picture and counterfeite to his likenes. For they saw a sweete countenance, mixed with a kinde of grauetie in his face, a feare with curtesie, and an incomparable Princely maiestie accompanied with a liuely spirit and youth, and his wit and manners were such, that they were both fearefull, and pleasant vnto men that frequented him. For as he was most pleasure in company hauing leasure, and most gauen to banking, pleasure life, and more wantonly geuen to follow any lust and pleasure, than any king that euer was: yet was he alwayes very carefull & diligent in dispatching matters of importance. And therefore he maruelously commended, and also endeouored to follow Dionysius, (as much to say, as Bacchus) aboute all the other goddesses, as he that had bene a wife and valliant Captaine in warre, and that in peace inuented and vsed all the pleasure that C might be. He maruelously loued and reuerenced his father, and it seemeth that the dutifullnes he shewed vnto his mother, was more to discharge the due obedience & dutie of a sonne, than otherwise to enterteine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for prooffe hereof we read, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went vnto his father Antigonus, geuing audience to certaine Ambassadors, and after he had done his dutie to him, and kissed him: he satte downe by him euen as he came from hunting, hauing his darters in his hande, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambassadors alowde as they went their way, hauing receiued their answer: my Lords, sayd he, you shall carie home this reporte of my sonne and me, be witnesses I pray you, how we liue one with an other. As meaning to shewe thereby, that the agreement betwix the father and the D sonne together, is a great safetie to the affaires of a king, as also a manifest prooffe of his greatness: so gealous is a king to haue a companion, besides the hate and mistrust it should breede. So that the greatest Prince and most auncientest of all the successors of Alexander, boasted that he stood not in feare of his sonne, but did suffer him to sitte by him, hauing a dart in his hand. So was this house onely of all other the Macedonian kinges, least defiled with such villanie, many successions after: and to confesse a troth, in all Antigonus rase there was not one, but Philip onely, that slue his owne sonne. But we haue many examples of diuers other houses of kinges, that haue put their sonnes, wiues, and mothers to death: and for their brethren, it was an ordinarie thing with them to kill them, and neuer stick to it. For like as Geometricians would haue men graunt them certaine propofitions which they suppose without E prooffe: euen so was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the safetie of their estate. But further, to shewe you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and courteous nature, and that he dearly loued his frendes: we may alleage this example. Mithridates, the sonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar frend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus court, and neuer practised any villanie or treason to him, neither was he thought such a man: yet Antigonus did somewhat suspect him, because of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great felde, he sowed of these scrapings of gold, and that of that feede, first of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that shortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the straw, and the eares of the wheate cut of, and that he being angrie and verie foor for it, some tolde F him that Mithridates had cut of these golden eares of wheate, and had caried them with him into the realme of PONT. Antigonus being maruelously troubled with this dreame, after he had made

A made his sonne sweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuy to that he would tell him: he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this young man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruelous sory for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont to passe the time away with Mithridates, he durst not by word of mouth vnto that he knew, because of his other howbeit, taking him aside from his other familiars, when they were both together by them selves, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: sic Mithridates. Mithridates found straight what he ment, and fled the very same night into CAPPADOCIA and shortly after it was his desining to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly contries, and it was he onely that established the house of the kingdom of PONT, the which B the ROMANES afterwarde overthrowe, about the eight succession. By these examples we may easily coniecture the good nature and curtesie of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are euer at * strife together, but specially those that are nearest eache to other: euen so, though all the successors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it soonest kindled, and most cruell betwene them which bordered nearest vnto the other, and that by being neare neighbours: had alwaies occasion of brawle together, as fell out at that time betwene Antigonus and Pholomy. This Antigonus lay most commonly in the contry of PHRYGIA: who hauing intelligence that Pholomy was gone into CYPRVS, and that he ouerranne all SYRIA, winning by force, or fairer meanes, all the townes and cities subiect vnto them: he sent his sonne Demetrius thither, beeing at that time but two and twenty C yeares of age; and it was the first time that euer he tooke charge as generall to his father in matters of great importance. But he being a young man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battell with an olde souldier (trained vp in the discipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, and that through him, and in his name, had fought many great battells) was soone overthrowen, and his armie put to flight, by the citie of GAZZA. At which overthrow were slayne five thousand men, and almost eight thousand taken: and besides, Demetrius lost his tents & paulions, his gold and siluer, and to be short, all his whole cariage. But Pholomy sent him all his things againe, and his friends also that were taken after the battell, with great courteous wordes: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but onely for honor, and Empire. Demetrius receiuing them at his handes, besought the gods that he might not long D liue a debter vnto Pholomy for this great curtesie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this overthrow like a young man, though it was his first souldierfear: but like an olde and wise Captaine, that had abidden many overthrowes, he vfed great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, and to keepe the cities & contries in his hands vnder obedience, and did traine and exercise his souldiers in armes, whome he had gathered together. Antigonus hauing newes of the overthrow of his sonne Demetrius, said no more, but that Pholomy had ouercome bearded men: and that afterwarde he should fight with bearded men. But now, because he would not discourage his sonne altogether, who craued liues once againe to fight a battell with Pholomy: he graunted him. So, shortly after came Cilic, Pholomyes generall, with a great puyfant armie, to driue him altogether out of SYRIA. For they made no great accompt of Demetrius, because he had bene once overthrowen before. Howbeit Demetrius staid upon him, gaue him charge on the sodaine, and made him so afraid, that he tooke both the campe, & the generall, with seven thousand prisoners besides, and wanne a maruelous treasure of money: which made him a glad man, not so much for the gain he should haue by it, as for the oportunitie he had thereby to come out of Pholomyes det, nothing regarding the treasure nor the honor he had gotten by this victorie, but onely the benefit of his requittall of Pholomyes curtesie towards him. But yet he did nothing of his owne head, before he had written to his father: and then receiuing full graunt and commissi- F on from him to dispose of all things as he thought good, he sent backe Cilic vnto Pholomy, and all his other friends besides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifullly bestowed on them. This misfortune and overthrow did vtterly put Pholomy out of all SYRIA, and brought Antigonus also from the citie of CILICIES, for the exceeding ioy he had of this victorie, as also for the great desire he had to see his sonne. After that, he sent Demetrius into ALEXIA, against a people called the NABATHIANS, to conquer them: but there he was in great daunger and distresse in the deserts for lacke of water, howbeit he neuer shewed any signe that he was afraid. Thereby he so astonied the barbarous people, that he had leysure enough to retire with safetie, and with a great booy of a thousand camells, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus, (whome Antigonus had driuen from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other ayde then of him selfe: and went with a great armie against the people and nations confining vnto the INDIANS, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucasus, to conquer them. Thereupon Demetrius hoping to find MESSOPOTAMIA without any gard or defence, sodainly passed ouer the riuer of Euphrates, & came vnto BABELON, and there distressed the garrison of Seleucus, that kept one of the castles or citadells of the cite, being two of them: and then putting in sixteen thousand soldiers to keepe them, he commaunded the rest of his men to get what they could, & to bringe it away with them. After that, he marched towards the sea to returne home, leauing thereby the Realme and kingdom of Seleucus in better state and safetie, then it was when he invaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the contry from Seleucus, leauing him nothing in it, by spoiling and forraging all that was there. At his returne home, newes were brought him that Polomy lay at the leage of the cite of HALYCARNASSVS: whereupon he drew thither with speede to make him raise the seage, and thereby saued the city from him. Now, because by this exploit he wanne great fame, both of them, (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruelous desire to set all GREECE at libertie, the which Polomy and Cassander kept in seruitude and bondage. Neuer king tooke in hand a more honorable nor iuster warre and enterprise, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppressing of the barbarous people: he bestowed it all in restoring the GREECIANS to their libertie, and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in consultation what way to take, to bring their purpose and desire to passe, and hauing taken order to begin first at ATHENS: one of Antigonus chiefest friends about him, told him that he should take the cite, and place a good garrison there for them selves, if they could once winne it: for, said he, it will be a good bridge to passe further into all GREECE. Antigonus would not harken to that, but said, that the loue and good will of men was a surer bridge, & that the cite of ATHENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings shine through the world, as a cresset light, vpon the toppe of a kepe or watche tower. Thus Demetrius hoysed sayle, hauing fise thousand silver talents, and a flecte of two hundred and fiftie sayle, and sailed towards the cite of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was gouernor in the behalfe of Cassander, & kept a great strong garrison there within the hauen and castell of MVNICHIA. He had an excellent good winde to further his iorney, so that with his good foresight and speede he made, he arrived in the hauen of PIRÆA, the fise and twenty day of the moneth Thargelion, (now called Maye) before any man knew of his comming. Now when this flecte was within a kenning of the cite, and lesse, that they might easily fee them from thence: euery man prepared him selfe to receive them, taking them to be Prologies shippes. But in fine, the Captaines and gouernors vnderstanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe them selves: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, and to repulse them, comming so sodainly vpon them. Demetrius hauing found the barre of the hauen open, launched in presently. Then being comen to the view of them all, & standing vpon the hatches of his galley, he made signes with his hand that he prayed silence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heralds, that his father had sent him in happy hower to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garrisons, and to restore them againe to their ancient libertie and freedom, to enioye their lawes and auncient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamacion made, all the common people straight threw downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clappe their handes with great shewes of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him alowde their Sauior, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the stronger in, although he performed not that he promised, and also sent Ambassadors vnto him to treat of peace. Demetrius receiued them very curiously, and sent with them for pledge, one of the dearest friends

A friends his father had, Aristodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not careless of the health and safety of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who, by reason of the change and alteration of the gouernment of the common wealth at ATHENS, stood more in feare of the people of ATHENS, than of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, caused him to be conueyed (according to his desire) vnto THEBES, with good and sufficient safe conduct. And for Demetrius him selfe, although he was very desirous to see the cite, he saide he would not come into it, before he had first restored it vnto her auncient libertie and freedom, and also driuen away the garrison thence: and thereupon he cast trenches round about the castell of MVNICHIA. In the meane season because he would not be idle, he hoysed sayle, and coasted towards the cite of MEGARA, within the which Cassander also kept a strong garrison. Demetrius busily following these matters, was aduertised that Cratesipolis, surnamed Polyperchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Lady of passing fame and beaurty, and lay at that time in the cite of PATRAS, would be glad to see him: he leauing his armie within the territorie of the MEGARIANS, tooke his iorney presently vnto her, with a few of his lightest armed men, and yet he stole from them, and made his tent to be set vp a good way from them, because this Ladie might not be seene when he came vnto him. Some of his enemies hauing present intelligence thereof, came and set vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was so scared, that he had no further leysure, but to cast an ill fauored cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising him selfe to flee for life, and escaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they missed him, they tooke his tent, and all his money in it. After that, the cite of MEGARA was taken and won from Cassanders men, where Demetrius souldiers would haue sacked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble intercession for them, that they might not be spoyled. Demetrius thereupon, after he had driuen out Cassanders garrison, he restored it againe to her former libertie. In doing that, he called to mind the Philosopher Stilpo, a famous man in MEGARA, though he liued a quiet and contemplative life. He sent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo answered him, they had not. For, said he, I sawe no man that tooke my learning from me. This notwithstanding, all the slaues of the cite were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way saide vnto him: well, Stilpo, I leaue you your cite free. It is true, O king, said he, for thou hast left vs neuer a slaue. Shortly after, he returned againe vnto ATHENS, and layde seage to the castell of MVNICHIA, the which he tooke, and draue out the garrison, & afterwards raised it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earnest desire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refresh him selfe in their cite: he made his entry into it, and caused all the people to assemble, and then restored vnto them their auncient lawes and libertie of their contry, promising them besides, that he would procure his father to sende them a hundred and fiftie thousand bushells of wheate, and as much woode and tymber as should serue to make them a hundred and fiftie gallies. Thus, the ATHENIANS through Demetrius meanes, recovered the Democracia again, (to wit, their popular gouernment) fiteene yeares after they had lost it, and liued all the time betweene their losse and restitution from the warre called Lamiaeus warre, and the battell that was fought by the cite of CRANON, in the state of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a fewe gouernors in sight, but in truth a Monarchie or kingdome, because they were vnder the gouernment of one man Demetrius PHALERIAN, that had absolute authoritie ouer them. But by this meanes they made their fauor and preferer of their contry. Demetrius (who seemed to haue obtained such honor and glory through his goodnes and liberalitie) hateful and odious to all men, for the ouergreat and vnmeasurable honors which they gaue him. For first of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwayes refused the name, and the which, (among all other princely honors and prerogatives graunted) they that had deuided betwene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durst neuer once presume to challenge, nor to take vpon them. So vnto them only they gaue the style and names of the goddes sauors, and tooke away their yearely Maior, whome they called Eponymos, because they did shew the yeares of olde time, by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordeyned in the counsell of the cite, that there should yearely be chosen one by voyces of the people, whom they should name the Priest of their Saints, whose name they should write and subscribe in all publike graunts and couenants, to shewe the yeare: and besides all this, that they should cause their pictures to be drawn in the veyle or holy banner, in the which were set out the images of their goddes, the patrones and protectors of their citie. And furthermore they did consecrate the place, where Demetrius first came out of his coche, and there did set vp an altar, and called it Demetrius altar coming out of his coche: and vnto their tribes they added two other, the ANTIGONIDES and the DEMETRIADES. Their great counsell at large which they created yearely of five hundred men, was then first of all brought into sixe hundred, because euery tribe must needs furnishe of them selues, fifty counsellors. But yet the straungest acte, and most new found inuention of flattery, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people pleaser) who put forth this decree, by the which it was ordeined: that those whome the common wealth should send vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, should in stead of Ambassadors be called Theori, as much to say, as ministers of the sacrifices. For so were they called, whome they sent to Delfes to Apollo Pythias, or vnto Elide, to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and solemne feasts of all Grecians, to doe the ordinary sacrifices and oblations for the health and preseruacion of the cities. This Stratocles in all things els was a desperate man, and one that had alwayes led a wicked and dissolute life: & for his shameles boldnes, he seemed wholly to follow the steppes of Cleons soole hardines, and olde infolencie, which (when he liued) he shewed vnto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his house called Phylacion. One day she hauing bought for his supper, beastes heades and neckes commonly eaten, he sayd vnto her: why, how now? thou hast bought me acates which we tosse like balls, that haue to doe in the common wealth. Another time when the armie of the ATHENIANS was ouerthrowen by sea, by the Ile of Amorgos: he would needes preuent the newes of this ouerthrowe, and came through the freete of Ceranicus, crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell: and was also the author of a decree, whereby they did sacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thanks for the victorie: and meate was giuen amongst euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But shortly after the Messengers arriued, which brought report of the shipwracke and ouerthrowe. The people were in an vprore withal, and fust for Stratocles in a maruelous rage. But he with a face of brasse came vnto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: well, and what hurt haue I done you, if I haue made you mery theser two dayes? Such was D Stratocles impudencie and rashnes. But, as the Poet Aristophanes sayth:

But whether matters were that time in hand, Than fire that wasteth both by sea and land.

For there was another that passed Stratocles in knauerie. Who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the citie of ATHENS, he should be receiued with all ceremonies and like solemnitie, as they vse in the feasts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further that they should giue vnto him that did excell all the rest in sumptuousnes and riches, at such time as Demetrius made his entry into the citie, so much money out of the common treasure, as should serue to make an image or other offering, which should be consecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And last of all, they chaunged the name of the moneth Munichion (to witte the moneth of Ianuary) and called it Demetrian: and the last day of the moneth which they called before the new and olde moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feastes of Bacchus also called then Dionysia, they presently named Demetria. But the goddes by diuers signes and tokens shewed plainly, that they were offended with these chaunges and alterations. For the holy banner in the which (according to the order set downe) they had paynted the images of Antigonus, and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua: as they carried it a proceffion through the freete Ceranicus, it was torne a sonder in the middle by a tempest of winde. And furthermore, about the altars which were set vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of hemlocke, the which otherwise was vnpossible to growe there. On the feast day also of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or proceffion for that daye, it was such an extreame hard frost out of all season: and besides, there fell such a myll dewe and great frost vpon it, that not only their vines and oliues were killed killed with it, but also the most part of the wheate blades which were newly sprung vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemye of the foresayd Stratocles) in one of his comedies writeth certaine verses against him to this effect.

*The vaine for whose wickednes the veyle was rent in tempest, VVhich vnto the honor due to God did worship men most vaine,
Is he for whom our budding vines were blasted with the frost, Those things and not our comedies haue vs so deeply lost.*

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lysimachus, in so much that for his sake the king had done many pleasures to the common wealth of ATHENS. For he loued him so dearly, that as often as he saw him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance: he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For in deed he did not so much esteeme him for the excellencie of his arte, but he was much more to be beloued & esteemed, for his virtuous and honest conditions. He was no troublesome man, neither was he infected with the finenesse of court, as he shewed one day when the king made much of him, and giuing him good countenance said vnto him: what wilt thou haue me giue thee of my things Philippides? euen what it shall please thee, O king, for it be none of thy lectures. Thus much we thought good to speake of him in bytlike, because an honest player of comedies, should matche with a shameles and impudent Orator of the people. But yet there was another Demetrias, of the village of SPHETTUS, that dreamed out a more straunger kind of honesty, touching the consecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo. Demetrias, that is to say, that they should goe & aske the oracle of Demetrius. But I will shewe you the very effect and forme of the law as it was set downe. In good howbeit the people ordeined that he should be chosen one of the Citizens of ATHENS, which shall goe vnto our father, and after that he hath done due sacrifice vnto him, he shall aske Demetrius our fauor, after what sort the people shall with greatest holines and deuotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings: and according to the oracle it shall please him to giue them, the people shall duely execute it. Thus, laying vpon Demetrius all these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wise man, they made him a very foole. Demetrius being at that time at leisure in ATHENS, he married a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient house of Miltiades, and had bene married before vnto one Ophelias Prince of the CYRENIANS, and tharafter his death returned againe to ATHENS. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this marriage, and thought it the greatest honor that came to their citie, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was soone wonne to be married, for he had many wiues, but amongst them all, he loued Phila best, and gaue her most honor and preheminentie aboue them all: partly for the respect of her father Antipater, and partly also for that she had bene first married vnto Craterus, whome the MACEDONIANS loued best when he liued, and most lamented after his death, aboue all the other successors of Alexander. His father I suppose made him to marry her by force, although in dede her yeares was not meete for him: for he was maruelous young, and the very olde. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rownd him softly in the eare with this saying:

Refuse no woman nere so old, VVhose marriage bringeth store of gold.

Wherein he alluded cunningly to these verses of Euripides.

Refuse not to become a thrall,

Where lucre may in seruice withall.

But so much did Demetrius honor his wife Phila, and all his other wiues he married, that he was not ashamed to keepe a number of Curensians, and other mens wiues besides: so that he only of all other kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this fort, he was commaunded by his father, to fight with Pholomy for the Realme of CYPRUS. So there was no remedie but he must needs obey him, although other wife he was very fory to leaue the warre he had begonne, to set the GRACIANS at libertie, the which had bene farre more honorable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from ATHENS, he sent vnto Cleonides Pholomyes generall, that kept the cities of CARUS and SYR-

ONE to offer him money if he would sette those cities at libertie. But Cleonides would not de-lect withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius straight way tooke fea, and sayled with all his armie towards CYPRVS, where at his first comming he ouercame Menelaus Ptolomyes brother. But shortly after, Ptolomy went thither in person with a great armie both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them fierce threatnings and prowde words to eche other. For Ptolomy sent to Demetrius to bid him to depart if he were wise, before all his armie came together: which would tread him vnder their feete, and marche vpon his bellie, if he taried their com-ming: Demetrius on the other side sent him word, that he would doe him this fauor to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise vnto him to withdrawe his garrisons which he had in the cities of CORINTHE, and SYCIONA. So the expectation of this battell made these two Princes not onely very pensieue to fight one with the other, but also all the other Lords, Princes, and kings: bicause the successe thereof was vncertaine, which of them two should preuaile. But euery man iudged this, that which of them obtayned the victorie, he should not only be Lord of the Realme of CYPRVS and SYRIA, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fiftie sayle beganne to rowe against his enimie Demetrius, and commanded his brother Menelaus that when he sawe them fast grappled in fight together, he should launche out of the hauen of SALAMINA, and giue charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius shippes, to breake their order, with the three score gallies he had in charge. Demetrius on the other side prepared tenne gallies against these three score, thinking them: knowe to choke vp the hauen mouth being but narrowe, so that none of the gallies that were within could come out: and furthermore, he disperised his armie by land vpon the foreland points which reache into the sea, and went him selfe into the maine sea with nynce score gallies, and gaue such a fierce charge vpon Ptolomy, that he valiantly made him flie. Who when he sawe his armie broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight gallies onely: for all the rest were either broken or suncke in fight, and those eight onely escaped, besides three score and tenne which were taken, and all their fouldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers, and household seruants, his wives, his gold and siluer, his armor, engines of batterie, and all such other warlike furniture and munition as was conueyed aboard his carecks and great shippes riding at anker: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among those spoyle also was taken that famous Curisian Lamia, who at the first had her name onely for her passing playing vpon the flute: but after she fell to Curtisan trade, her countenance and credit increased the more. So that euen then when her beautie through yeares fell to decaye, and that she found Demetrius much younger then her selfe: yet the so wanne him with her sweete conuersation and good grace, that he onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victorie by sea, Menelaus made no more resistance, but yielded vp SALAMINA & his shippes vnto Demetrius, and put into his hands also twelue hundred horsemen, and twelue thousand footemen well armed. This so famous & triumphant victorie was yet much more beautified, by Demetrius great boundtie and goodnes which he shewed in giuing his enemies slaine in battell honorable funerals, setting the prisoners at liberty without ransom paying, and giuing moreouer twelue hundred complet armors vnto the ATHENIANS. After this, Demetrius sent Arifodemus MILESIAN vnto his father Ant-igonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victorie. Arifodemus was the greatest flatterer in all Antigonus Court, who deuised then, as it seemeth to me, to adde vnto this exploit the greatest flatterie possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of the Ile of CYPRVS, he would in no wise haue the shippe he came in to come neare the shoare, but commanded them to ride at anker, and no man so hardy to leaue the shippe: but he him self got into a litle boate, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in maruelous feare and perplexitie for the successe of this battell, as men may easily iudge they are, which hope after so great incertainties. Now when worde was brought him that Arifodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worse troubled than afore, in so much that he could scant keepe within doores him selfe, but sent his seruants and friends one after another to meete Arifodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him worde presently againe how the world went.
But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on still fayer and foyler with a 144

A sad countenance, and very demurely, speaking neuer a worde. Wherefore, Antigonus hart being cold in his belly, he could stay no longer, but would him selfe goe and meete with Arifodemus at the gate, who had a maruelous preface of people following on him, besides those of the Court which ranne out to heare his gunfwer. At length when he came neare vnto Ant-igonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cryed out aloud, God saue thee, O king Ant-igonus: we haue ouercome king Ptolomy in battell by sea, and haue wonne the Realme of CYPRVS, with sixtene thousand and eyght hundred prisoners. Then answered Antigonus, and God saue thee to: Truly Arifodemus thou hast kept vs in a trawne a good while, but to punish thee for the payne thou hast put vs to, thou shalt the later receiue the reward of thy good newes. Then was the first time that the people with a lowde voice called Antigonus and Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friendes and familiers did at that present instant put on the royall band or diadeame vpon his heade: But for Demetrius, his father sent it vnto him, and by his letters called him king. They also that were in EGYPT with Ptolomy, vnder-standing that, did also call and salute him by the name of king: bicause it should not seeme that for one ouerthrowe receiued, their hartes were deade. Thus this ambition by ielousie & emulation, went from man to man to all Alexanders successors. For Lysimachus then also be-ganne to weare the diadeame, and likewise Seleucus, as often as he spake with the GRECIANS for before that tyme, he delt in matters with the barbarous people as a king. But Cassander, though others wrote them selues kinges, he onely subscribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an increase of a newe name, or chaunging of apparell, but it was such an honor, as it lyft vp their hartes, and made them stand vpon them selues: and besides it so framed their manner of life and conseruation with men, that they grew more prowd and stately, then euer they were before: like vnto common players of tragedies, who apprelling them selues to playe their partes vpon the stage, doe chaunge their gate, their countenance, their voyce, their manner of sitting at the table, and their talke also. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commanding their subiects, when they had once taken away the viler and diminution of their absolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought such a wonderfull chaunge in the worlde. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the vi-ctorie of his sonne Demetrius, for the conquest of CYPRVS: he determined forthwith to set D vpon Ptolomy. Him selfe led the armie by land, hauing his sonne Demetrius still rowing by the shore side with a great flete of shippes. But one of his familiers called Medius, being asleepe had a vision one night that told him, what should be the ende and successe of this iorney. He thought he sawe Antigonus ronne with all his armie who should haue the vpper hande, and that at the first he ranne with great force and swiftnesse: but that afterwards his strength and breath sayled him so much, that when he should returne, he had scant any poullie or breath, and with much adoe retyred agayne. And euen so it chaunced vnto him. For Antigonus by land, was eftsoones in great daunger: and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leaue the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places, where was neither hauen, creekes, nor harborough for his shippes. And at length, hauing lost a great number of his shippes, E he was driuen to returne without any attempt giuen. Nowe Antigonus was at that tyme litle lesse then foure score yeare olde, but yet his fate and corpulent bodie was more comberfom to him then his yeares: therefore being growen vnmete for warres, he vsed his sonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skillfull through the experience he had gotten, did wisely gouerne the waightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthfull partes, lauihe expences, and common dronkenness he gaue him selfe vnto. For in tyme of peace, he was giuen ouer to all those vices: but in tyme of warre, he was as sober and continent, as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly knowne to be Mystrisse ouer him, one daye when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kisse his father: and that Antigonus smyling vpon him F sayde, what, howe now Sonne, doest thou thinke thou art kissing of Lamia? Another tyme Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and sawe not his father: and then to excuse him selfe vnto him, he tolde him he had gotten a rewme that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard sayde Antigonus: but was it of Thaesos or Chios, that rewme? he spake it, because that in either of those two llands, there were excellent good wines. Another tyme Demetrius sent his father worde that he was now well. Thereupon Antigonus went to see him, and coming thither, he mette a fayce younge boye at his doore. So he went vnto his chamber, and sitting downe by his bedde side, he rooke him by the hande to feele his poulse. Demetrius tolde him that his feuer had left him but a litle before. I knowe it well, sayde Antigonus: for I mette the younge boye euen at the doore as I came in. So Antigonus did gently beare with his sonnes faulces, in respēct of his many other vertues he had. The voyce goeth that the SCYTHIANS, when they are disposed to drinke dronke together, doe duers tymes twange the strynges of their bowes, as though that would deserue to keepe the strength of their courage and hardines, which otherwise the pleasures of the wine woulde take from them. But Demetrius gaue him selfe to one thinge at one selfe tyme. Sometime to take his pleasure, fosome tyme to deale in matters of waight, and in all extremitie he euer vsed but one of them, and woulde neuer myngle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding he was no lesse politike and circumspect to prepare all manner of munition for warres. For as he was a wise Captaine to leade an armie, so was he also very carefull to prouide all thinges meete for their furniture, and woulde rather haue too muche, then too litle. But aboute all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of shippes, and framing of all sortes of engines of batterie, and specially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuise them. For he had an excellent naturall witte to deuise suche workes, as are made by witte and hande, and did not bestowe his witte and inuention in handie craftes, in trifeling toyes and bables: as many other kinges that haue giuen them selues to playe on flutes, others to paynte and drawe, and others also to Turners crafte. As Aetropus kinge of Macedon, who delighted to make fine tables, and pretie lampes. And Attalus, surnamed Philometor (to saye, as louer of his mother) that woulde plante and sette Phisicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingewort, or Beares foote: Hyoscyamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Woolfesbaine, and Dorycinum: for the which he haue no Englishe worde: all these would he set him selfe with his owne handes in the gardeins of his pallace, and also gather them in tyme of the yere, to knowe the vertue and power of them. As Asaces, the kinges of PARTIA, that boasted they coulde them selues make their arrowe heades, and sharpen them. But the artificers workes which Demetrius practised, shewed that they came from a king. For his manner of workmanship had a certain greatnes in it, the which euen with the subtiltie and finenes of his workes, shewed the trymme handling of the workman: So that they appeared not onely worthy the vnderstanding and riches of a king, but also the forging and making by the handes of a great king. For his friendes did not onely wonder at their great-nes, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true, then meete to be spoken: the enemies could but maruell when they sawe his gallies rowing alongest the coaste, with fifteene or sixteene bankes of ores: and his engines of bat-terie which they called Elepolis (to saye, engines to take cities) were a spectacle of great admiration vnto those whom he besieged, as the euents following did thoroughly witness. E For Lysimachus who of all other kinges did malice Demetrius most, comming to raise the seege from the cite of SOLI in CILICIA, the which Demetrius besieged: he sent vnto him to pray him to let him see his engines of batterie, and his gallies rowing vpon the sea. Demetrius graunting him, Lysimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The RHODIANS also hauing long time defended his seege, at the last made peace with him, and prayed him to leaue some one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall testimonie & remembrance both of his power, and also of their courage and valliantnes. The cause why Demetrius made warre with the RHODIANS, was, because they were confederats with king Ptolomy, he brought against their walles the greatest engine he had, the foote whereof was like a tyle, more long then broad, and at the base on either side it was eyght and fortie cubits longe, and three score and sixe highe, rising still narrow euen to the very top: so that the ypper partes were narrower then the nether, & within it were many pretie roomes and places conueied for souldiers. The forepart of it was open

A open towards the enemie, & euery roome or partition had windowes, out of the which they bestowed all kind of shot, because they were full of armed men, fighting with all sortes of weapons. But nowe, because it was so well framed and counterpealed, that it gaue no way, nor reeld of either side, which way soeuer they remoued it, but that it stood fast and vpright vpon her foundation, making a terrible noyse and lownde: that made the workes wonderfull to behold, as it was a maruelous pleasure for men to see it. In this warre were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weying fortie pound a peece, and made by one Polus an Armor: who to shewe the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, suffered the iron to be pruned and shot at at six score paces, with the engines of their batterie: and albeit the armors were not at bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurte. Demetrius alwayes wore one of them in these warres, and Alcimus a Libanian the other, the strongest and valliantest was he had in all his hoast, and that onely caried a complete armour weying fixe score poundes, where all other souldiers wore none aboute three score. This Alcimus was slayne at Rhodes by the Rhodians fighting by the Theater. In this seege the RHODIANS did valliantly defende them selves, that Demetrius could doe no acte worthy memorie. This notwithstanding, although he sawe he could not preuaile, but lose his tyme, yet was he the more obstinately bent against them, because when they had taken a shippe of his, in the which his wife Phila had sent vnto him certaine hangings of tapetrie, linnen, apparell, and leuises, and because he had sent them all vnto Ptolomy, as soone as they had taken them. But the Rhodians did not C low the honest curtesie of the ATHENIANS: who hauing intercepted certain letters of Philip, Philips that made warre against them, they opened all the letters they carried, and read the sauiug onely his wife Olympias letters (he sent him, the which they leuied vnto king Philip) led, as they were when they receiued them. Nowe though this part did muche please and offend him, yet he could not finde in his hart to serue them in that sort, when he might haue done it not long after. For by chance at that tyme, Protagenes an excellent paynter, borne in the city of CAVVS, did paynt them the draught of the cite of ITALVS. Demetrius found this table in a house in the suburbs of the cite, being almost ended. The RHODIANS thereupon sending a Herald vnto him, to beseeche him to spare the defacing of so goodly a worke, he returned them aunswer, that he would rather suffer his fathers images to be burnt, then to D excellent and passing a worke as that to be losse, and brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protagenes was seuen yeares drawing of the same: and it is also sayde, that Apelles himselfe when he sawe it did so wonder at it, that his speeche fayled him, and he roode mure longe tyme, and at last sayde: surely there is a wonderfull peece of worke, and of great labor, yet they want those graces and ornaments whereby those that I paynt doe reache vnto heauen. This table afterwards being brought to Rome, and hanged vp with others, was in the ende burnt by fire. Nowe as the RHODIANS were desirous to be rid of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take any honest occasion to doe it: the Ambassadors of the Athenians came happily to serue both their desires, who made peace betweene them with these condicions. That the RHODIANS shoulde be confederats with Antigonus and Demetrius, and E gainst all men, but Ptolomy onely. The ATHENIANS sent for Demetrius vpon Thessandrus com-ming to laye seege to their cite. Whereupon Demetrius immediately hoyled laye, towards ATHENS, with three hundred and thirty gallies, and a great number of men of warre, because so that he did not only drue Cassander out of the prouince of ATTICA, but followed him when he fled to the straight of THERMOPILES, and there ouerthrew him in set battell, and receiued the cite of HERACLEA, which willingly yielded vnto him, and fixe thousand Macedonians were brought vnto him to take his part. So in his returne backe, he ferall the GREEKIANS at Liberis on this side the straight: he made league with the BOBOTIANS, and tooke the cite of CARNEA, and the castells of PHYLE and PANACTOS, in the frontiers and confines of ATTICA: in the which Cassander had left garrisons to keepe the contry in subiection: and after he had drunne them out of the contry, he rendred the forts againe vnto the ATHENIANS. Therefore though it seemed the ATHENIANS had before bestowed to their vntmost power all kinds of honors that could be offered him, euery man straining for life to prelerre the same: yet they found but new deuises to flatter and please him. For they ordain'd that the place behind the temple of Minerva, called Parthenon (as who would say, the temple of the virgin) should be prepared for his house to lye in: and they sayd, that the goddess Minerva did lodge him with her. But to say truly, he was too vnchaſt a ghest, to thinke that a mayden goddess would be content to be ſhoule lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiving that they had lodged his sonne Philip on a time in a house, where there were three younge women, he sayde nothing to Philip him selfe, but before him he sent for the harbinger, and sayde vnto him: wilthout not remove my sonne out of this straight lodging, & prouide him of a better: And Demetrius, that should haue reuerenced the goddess Minerva, though for no other respect, but because he called her his eldest sister, (for so he would she should be called) he defiled all the call'd was the temple of these holy virgines, with horrible and abominable insolencies, both towards younge boyes of honest houses, as also vnto younge women of the cite. So that this place seem'd to be most pure and holy, at such time as he laye with his common Curtisians, Chryſis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra. It shall not be greatly for the honor of the cite of Athenas, to tell particularly all the abominable partes he committed there, But Democles vertue and honestie deserueth worthy and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a younge boye that had no heare on his face, of whose beautie Demetrius being informed by the surname he had, as commonly called through the cite, Democles the fayer: he foughte diuers waies to intise him, both by fayer meanes, large promises and giftes, and also with threats besides. But when he saw no man could bringe him to the bent of his bowe, and that the younge boye in the ende seeing him so importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exercise, where other children used to recreate them selues, and that to auoide the common ſcoques, he went to walk him selfe in another secret stouee: Demetrius watching his time and hower of going thither, followed him, and got in to him being alone. The boy seeing him selfe alone & that he could not resist Demetrius, tooke of the couer of the kete or chawdron where the water was boyling, and leaping into it, drowned him selfe. Truly he was vnworthy of so lamentable an ende, but yet he shewed a noble hart, worthy of his beautie and contrie. But he did not as another called Cleomenes, the sonne of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius directed to the people, whereby, through Demetrius intercession & request, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained prisoner) was clerely remitted and forgiuen. But by this acte, he not onely flamed and dishonored him self, but also troubled all the cite. For the people thereupon releas'd Cleomedon of his fine, but therewith they made a decree that no Citizen should thenceforth bring any moe letters from Demetrius. But afterwards, vnderstanding that Demetrius was maruelously offended with this decree: they did not onely reuoke their first decree, but they did also put some of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a lawe, that the people of Athenas should account all religious to the gods, and iust vnto men, whatſoeuer it pleas'd Demetrius to order and appoynt. At that time there was one of the chiefest men of the cite, that saide Stratocles was a mad man to preſerre such matters. In deſede, Demochares surnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwife: and he spake it, because this Stratocles had many great pleasures at Demetrius hands. For this flatterie. Howbeit Demochares being accused and condemned vpon these wordes, he was banished Athenas. See after what sorte the Athenians reſtor'd them selues, who seem'd to be deliuer'd from the garriſon they had before, and to be reſtor'd vnto their former libertie and freedom. From thence Demetrius went into PELOPONNESVS, and neuer an enemye of his durst tary his coming, but all fled before him, and left him their castles & townes. Thus Demetrius van into him selfe all the contry called ACTE, and all ARCHADIA, ſauing the cite of MANTINEA: & for the summe of an hundred talents giuen amongst them, he deliuer'd the cities of ARGOS, SIKYONE, and of CORINTHE, from the garriſons that laye amongst them. About that tyme tell out the great feaſt of Iuno in ARGOS, called Heræa. Therefore Demetrius, to honor this feaſt with the GRÆCIANS, married Deidamia (the Daughter of AEACIDES, king of the MOLOSSIANS, and sister of Pyrrhus) and perdid the SIKYONIANS to leaue their cite, and to come and builde in an other goodly place neare vnto it, where

A where they now doe dwell: and so with the place and situation, he chaung'd also the name of the cite. For in ſtead of SIKYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a general assembly of the states of GRÆCE, which was kept in the straight of PELOPONNESVS, called ISTHOS: Demetrius was chosen Lieutenent general of all the GRÆCIANS, as Philip & Alexander (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only compare him selfe, but thought him selfe greater than they, because fortune smiled on him, and for that he had so good ſuccesse in all his affayres. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king, from any other kings: neither did euer call him selfe king of kings, although he had giuen vnto diuers of them the name and power of a king. And in contrary manner also, Demetrius laugh'd them to ſcorne which called any other Princes, kings, but his father and him selfe. Moreouer he tooke great pleasure to heare his flatterers, who being at bankets called for wine to drinke to king Demetrius, and then to Selenus maister of the Elephants, to Ptolomy Admiral, to Lyſimachus keeper of the treasure, and to Agathocles SICILIAN, governor of the Iles. All the kings, but Lyſimachus, laugh'd at these toys when they were reported to them: but Lyſimachus was very angry, & thought great skorne that Demetrius should reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old custom commonly to giue an Euenuke the charge of keeping the treasure. So Lyſimachus of all other Princes did beare him most malice, and because he would finely tawnt him for that he euer kept Lamia his Curtisan with him: vntil this present time, said he, I neuer saw harlot play in a tragedy before. Demetrius answered him againe, that his harlot was chaster, then Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his iorney towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be receiued into the fraternitie of the holy myſteries, and that he ment they should shew him at one ſelfe time, all that was to be ſcene, euen from the least to the highest ſecrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, because they made the brethern of the fraternitie ſee them long time after that they had bene first receiued into the lesser ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was euer heard of before. For these smaller miſteries in olde time were celebrated in the month of November, and the greater in the month of August: & beside it was not lawfull to celebrate or vie these ceremonies within the space of a yeare one of thother. When these letters were openly red, no man durst ſpeake againſt them, but Pythodorus the Priest, who caried the torch lighted when they shewed these miſteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuise of Stratocles it was enacted at an assembly of the cite, that the month of March in the which they were at that time, should be called and reputed November. And so, as they could beſt helpe it by their ordinances of the cite, they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternitie of the miſteries: & afterwards againe, this ſelfe month of March which they had translated into November, became ſodainly August: and in the ſelfe ſame yeare was celebrated the other ceremonie of these great miſteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to ſee the moſt ſtraighteſt and ſecreteſt ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inueyng againſt the ſacriledge, and impietie of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made these verbes of him:

Into one mooneth his coming hither Flash thruſt vp all the yeare together.

And afterwards because Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerva within the caſtell:

Of chaste Minerva ſee how he makes a filthie ſervuſe,
And in that Virgins very ſight his harlots doſh abuſe.

But yet of all the insolent parts done at that time in Athenas, (although many were committed) none of all the reſt greued the Athenians more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them they should preſently furniſh him with two hundred & fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very harde vnto them, both for the ſhortnes of the time appoynted them, as also for the impossibilitie of abating any part of it. When he had ſcene all this masse of money laid on a heape before him, he commanded it should be giuen to Lamia, & among his other Curtisians, to buy them ſope. The ſame the Athenians receiued by this gift, greued them more, than the loſſe of their money: & the words he spake to the great contempt of them and their citie, did more trouble them, then the payment they made. Some say notwithstanding, that Demetrius did not alone vse the ATHENIANS thus shamefully, but the THESSA- LIANS also in the same manner. But passing this ouer: Lamia of her selfe, & through her owne countenance, did get a great summe of money together of diuers persons for one supper the made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lycan, borne in the Ile of SAMOS, did set downe the order thereof in writing. And therefore a certain Poet not lesse pleasantly, then truly, called this Lamia, Elapsiv: to wete, an engine to take cities. And Demochares also borne in the citie of SOL, called Demetrius a fable, because he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which olde women tell litle children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to say, as a witche, or forcereffe. So that the great credit & authoritie this Lamia had, and the loue which Demetrius bare her: did not onely cause his wiues suspect and enuy him, but made him hated also of all his friends & familiers. And therefore certain gentle-me whom Demetrius sent in ambassage vnto king Lysimachus, he talking familiarly with them, & passing the time away, shewed them great wounds of the clawes of a lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them also how he was forced to fight with the lyon, when through king A- lexanders fury he was shut vp in his denne with him: they smiling to heare him, told him that the king their maister had also certeine markes and bytings on his necke, of a vile beast called Lamia. And to say truly, it was a wonderful thing, that marrying (as he did) his wife Philo- much against his will, because she was too olde for him: how he was so rauished with Lamia, and did so constantly loue her so long together, considering that she was also very old, & past the best. Therefore Demo, surnamed Mania, (as much to say, the mad woman) pleasantly aun-swered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had plained on the flure all supper time, what she thought of Lamia? an old woman, O king, she. Another time when frute was ser-ued in, after the bord was taken vp: doe you see said Demetrius, how many pretty fine knackes Lamia sendeth me? My mother, answered Demo againe, will send you moe then these, if you please to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that she ouerthrew Bocchoris iudgement in a matter. In EGYPT there was a young man that had a maruelous fancie vnto a famous Curtisan, called Thonis: who did aske him luche a great summe of money to lye with her, that it was vnpossible for him to giue it her. At length, this amorous youth being so deepe in loue with her, dreamed one night he laye with her, and enioyed her: so that for the pleasure he rooke by his conceyt and imagination, when he awaked, his earnest loue was satisfied. This Curtisan whome he had cast fancieto, hearing of his dreame, did put him in fure before the Iudges, to be payed her hyer for the pleasure the young man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the summe of her complaynt, commaunded the younge man to bringe before him in some vessell, at a daye appoynted, as much money as she did aske him to lye with her. Then he badde him tollie it too and froe in his hande before the Curtisan, that she shoulde but onely haue the shadowe and sight of it: for, she, imagination and opinion, is but a shadowe of truth. Lamia sayde this was no equall iudgement: for, sayth she, the shadowe onely, or the sight of the money, did not satisfie the couetousnes of the Curtisan, as the younge mans lust was quenched by his dreame. Thus enough spoken of the Curtisan. But now, the misfortunes and dealths of him we presently write of: they do transport our historie, as from a comycall into a tragical theater, that is to saye, from pleasant and light matter, into lamentable and bytter teares. For all the Princes and Kinges conspyred generally agaynst Antigonus, and ioyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Dem- etrius departed forthwith out of GRECE, and came to ioynne with his father, whose courage he founde more liuely and better giuen to this warre, then his yeares required: besides that Demetrius comming made him the bolder, and did litle vpper his harte the more.

And yet it seemes to me, that if Antigonus woulde but haue yeilded vpper a fewe trifling things, and that he coulde or woulde haue brydeled his ouer immoderate couetous desire to raigne: he had bothe kept for him selfe all the tyme of his life, and also lesse after his deathe vnto his sonne, the supreme dignitie and power, aboute all the other Kinges and successors of Alexander. But he was so cruell, and rashe of nature, and as insolent and braue in his doinges, as in his wordes: that thereby he stirred vpper, and brought vpper him as his enemies,

A enemies, many great and mighty Princes. For euen at that present time he said, that he would as easily disperie and scatter a sunder that conspiracie against him, as chowghes or other litle birdes comming to pecke vp the corne newly sowne, are easily scared awaye with a stone, or making any litle noyse. So he caried to the field with him, aboute three score and tenne thousand footemen, tenne thousand horsemen, and three score and fiftene Elephanes. His enemies had three score and foure thousand footemen, and fise hundred horsemen more then he, with foure hundred Elephanes, and six score cartes of warre. When the two armies were one neere vnto the other, me thinks he had some imagination in his head that chaunged his hope, but not his corage. For in all other battells and conflictes, hauing commonly vsed to looke bigge of the matter, to haue a lowde high voyce, and to vse braue wordes, and sometime also euen in the chieft of all the battell to geue some pleasant mocke or other, shewing a certaine trust he had in him selfe, and a contempt of his enemy: then they sawe him often times alone, and verie pensiuely, without euer a word to any man. One day he called all his armie together, and presented his sonne vnto the souldiers, recommending him vnto them, as his heire and succesor, and talked with him alone in his tent. Whereat men maruelled the more, because that he neuer vsed before to imparte to any man the secrets of his counsell and determination, no not to his owne sonne, but did all things of him selfe: and then commaunded that thing openly to be done, which he had secretly purposed. For prooffe hereof it is said, Demetrius being but a young man, asked him on a time when the campe should remoue: and that Antigonus in anger answered him, art thou affrayed thou shalt not heare the fownde of the trompet? Furthermore, there fell out many ill signes and tokens that killed their hartes.
For Demetrius dreamed that Alexander the great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and that he asked him what word or signall of battell they were determined to geue at the daye of the battell. He answered, that they were determined to geue, Iupiter, and Victoria. Then said Alexander, I will goe to thine enemies that shall receiue me. And afterwards, at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their armie were set in battell ray: Antigonus comming out of his tent, had such a great fall, that he fell flat on his face on the ground, and hurte him selfe verie forely. So when he was taken vp, then lifting vp his handes to heauen, he made his prayers vnto the goddes, that it would please them to graunt him victorie, or sodaine death without great paine, before he shoulde see him selfe vanquished, and his armie ouerthrowen. When both battells came to ioynne, and that they fought hand to hand: Demetrius that had the most parte of the horsemen with him, went and gaue charge vpon Antiochus the sonne of Seleucus, and fought it out so valliantly on his side, that he ouerthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chafe of them that fledde, and out of time: he married all, and was the occasion of the losse of his victorie. For when he returned from the chafe, he could not ioynne againe with their footemen, because the Elephanes were betwene both. Then Seleucus perceiuing Antigonus battell was naked of horsemen, he did not presently set vpon them, but turned at one side as though he woulde enuiron them behinde, and made them affrayed: yet making head as he would charge them, only to geue them leasure to come on their side, as they did. For the most parte of Antigonus hoast did forsake him, and yeilded vnto his enemies: & the rest of them fled euery man. And when a great trowpe of men together went with great furie to geue charge on that side where Antigonus was: one of them that were about him, sayd vnto him: your grace had neede take heede, for these men come to charge vs.
He answered againe: but how should they know me? And if they did, my sonne Demetrius will come and helpe me. This was his last hope, and still he looked euery way if he could see his sonne comming towards him: vntill at length he was slaine with arrowes, darts, & pikes.
For of all his frendes and souldiers there taried not one man by his bodie, but Thorax of the citie of LARISSA in THESSALIE. Now the battell hauing such successe as you haue heard, the Kinges and Princes that had won so glorious a victorie, as if they had cut a great bodie into sundrie peeces: they deuicid Antigonus kingdome among them, and euery man had his part of all the prouinces and contries which Antigonus kept, adding that vnto their other dominions which they possessed affore. Nowe Demetrius flying with all possible speede, that might be, with fise thousand footemen and foure thousand horsemen, he got to the citie of Sig-

EPHESVS: where euerie man mistrusted, that being needie of money as he was, he would not spare the temple of Diana in EPHESVS, but would rife all the gold and siluer in it. And in contrarie maner also, Demetrius being affrayed of his souldiers, least they would spoyle it against his will: he sodainly departed thence, and sayled towards GREECE, putting his greatest confidence & affiance in the ATHENIANS, bicause he had left his wife Deidamia at ATHENS, with shippes and some money, supposing he could goe no whether with better safety in his aduersitie, then to ATHENS, of whose good wills he thought him selfe assured. Wherefore when Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS came vnto him, and found him not farre from the Illes CYCLOADES, as he sayled with great speede towards ATTICA, and that they had declared vnto him, he should forbear to come vnto their citie, bicause the people had made an ordinance to suffer no moe kinges to come into ATHENS, and that they had sent Deidamia his wife honorable accompanied vnto the citie of MEGARA: then was Demetrius for verie anger & passion of minde, cleane out of countenance, although vntill that time he had patiently borne his aduersitie, and his hart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the harte, when he sawe (that contrarie to expectation) the ATHENIANS had deceiued and failed him in his greatest neede, and that in his aduersitie he found their former frendshippe counterfeate, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainly appeareth, that the most vncertaine and deceiueable profe of peoples good wills and cities towards Kings and Princes, are the immeasurable and extreame honors they doe vnto them. For sith it is so, that the truth and certainty of honor proceedeth from the good will of those that giue it: the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause for them to mistrust that the people doe it not with good will and from their harts, considering that for feare they doe the selfe same things, which they will also doe for loue. Therefore graue and wise Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set vp for them, or the tables or diuine honors they doe decree vnto them: as to regard their owne workes & deedes, and weying them truly, fo to beleue and receiue their honors for true, or otherwise to receiue and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they doe accept these immeasurable and extreame honors done vnto them, but those forties chiefly hate them most, that against their wills are forced to doe them those honors. Demetrius seeing then how iniuriouly the ATHENIANS had vied him, & at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them: he modestly sent vnto them only to make his complaints, and to demand his shippes, among the which was that galley of fixteene bankes of owers. The which when he had receiued, he hoysed saile immediatly towards the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there found all things to goe against him. For in euery place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yielded them vp, or else reuolted, & kept them against him. Therefore leauing Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GREECE, he tooke sea againe, & sayled towards CHERRONESVS, & there with the mischieues he did, & with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increafe, & to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great accompt of him, neither did they sturre to geue him aide, bicause he was nothing inferior vnto Demetrius; and for that he was of greater power and possessions then them selues, they therefore were the more affrayed of him. Shortly after, Seleucus sent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in marriage, notwithstanding that he had a sonne already called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a PERSIAN. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnes of his estate and kingdom, was able enough to maintaine many successors after him. And furthermore, he considered with him selfe that he should haue neede of Demetrius allyance, bicause he saw Lysimachus him selfe matche with one of Pholomyes daughters, & his sonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently tooke his daughter with him, & sayled with all his shippes directly towards SYRIA. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessitie to lande sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Pisistrachus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being geuen him by the other kings for his parte and porcion of the spoyle of Antigonum, after he was ouerthrowen. This Pisistrachus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh him Seleucus requieth Stratonice (Demetrius daughter) in marriage.

Pisistrachus, the brother of Cassander, at that time Governor of Cilicia.

A him selfe, but to forrage and spoyle bicause he would complaine of Seleucus for the allyance he made with their common enemy, without the content and priuite of all the other Kings and Princes confederats; he went purposely vnto his brother Cassander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, sodainly invaded the land, and spoyled as farre as the citie of CYNDUS, and caried away (which he had leauied) twelue hundred talentes, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure: and then with all the speede he could possible he returned to his shippes, and hoysed saile. Shortly after, his wife Philis also came vnto him. So Seleucus receiued them all neere vnto the citie of ROSSVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without forow or suspicion one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his tent, in the midst of his campe: & afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his galley, with thirtene bankes of owers. Thus they passed many dayes together, feasting and reioicing eche with other, being warned, and hauing no souldiers to waite vpon them: vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and tooke his way with great pompe towards the citie of ANTIOCHIA. Nowe for Demetrius, he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and sent his wife Philis vnto her brother Cassander, to auisore the complaints and accusations of Pisistrachus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GREECE to come vnto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, dyed of a sicknesse. Afterwardes Demetrius coming againe in fauor with Pholomy, by Seleucus his sonne in lawes meanes, he married his daughter Ptolemeide. Hitherunto Seleucus vied Demetrius verie courteously: but afterwards he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA againe, for a summe of money that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Seleucus shew a cruell and tyrannicall couetousnesse: for in anger, and with fierce threats and countenance he asked him the cities of TYRA, and SIDON. But therein he thinkes he lacked honestie and ciuility: as though he that had vnder his obedience and subiection all that which lay betwixt the INDIANS, and the sea of SYRIA, was in siche neede and pouertie: that for two cities onely, he should driue his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard & bitter chaunge. But thereby he rightly confirmed Platoes saying: that he that will be rich in deede, must endeuor him selfe not to increafe his riches, but rather to diminish his couetousnes. For he shall neuer be but a begger, and needie, whose couetous desire hath no ende. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yielded not for feare, but provided to replenish the cities with good garrisons to keepe them against him: saying, that though he had bene overcome ten thousand times more in battell, yet it should neuer sincke into his head that he should be contented, and thinke him selfe happie to buy Seleucus allyance so deere. On thother side, being aduertised that one Lachares hauing spied opportunitie when the ATHENIANS were in ciuill warres one against the other, and that he had ouercomen them, and did tyrannically vsurpe the gouernment: he then perswaded him selfe that he might easily winne it againe, if he came thither vpon the sodaine. Thereupon he crossed the seas with a great flecte of shippes, without any daunger: but he had such a great storme & tempest vpon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most parte of his shippes, and a great number of his men besides. But for him selfe he scaped, and began to make a litle warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time: he sent some of his men to gather a number of shippes againe together, and he him selfe in the meane time went into PELOPONNESVS, to laye siege to the citie of MASSENA, where his person was in greate daunger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blowe with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ranne through his cheek. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subiection againe, certaine townes that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into ATTICA, and tooke the cities of ELYSIN, and of RHAMNVS: and then spoyled all the contrie, & tooke a shippe fraught with corne, and hong vp the marchaunt that ought it, and the maister of the shippe that brought it. Thereby to terrifie all other marchaunts, that they should be affrayed to bring any more corne thither, and so to famish the citie, by keeping them from all things necessarie for their sustenance: and so it happened. For a bushell of salt was sold at ATHENS for fortiefluer Drachmas, and the bushell of wheate for three hundred Drachmas. In this extreame necessitie, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred and fiftie gallies they saw neere vnto ÆGINA, the which

ptolomy sent to aide them. For when the fouldiers that were in them sawe that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of shippes out of PELOPONNESVS, out of CYPRVS, & diuers other partes, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile, they wyped their anckers, and fled presently. Then Lachares forooke the city, and secretly faued him selfe. Nowe the ATHENIANS, who before had commaunded vpon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the counsell, to treat of any peace with Demetrius: they did then vpon Lachares flying, presently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and sent Ambassadors vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but because necessity draue them so. During this so hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and straunge things: but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and the sonne sitting in their house, voide of all hope of life: there fell a dead ratte before them from the topp of the house, and that the father and sonne fought who should haue it to eat. Moreover, that at the selfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained him selfe and his schollers, by getting them a proportion of beanes euery day, by the which they liued. Thus the cite of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremitie, Demetrius made his entrie into it, and gaue commanndement to all the citizens, that they shoulde assembe euery man within the Theater: where he made them to be compased in with armed fouldiers, and then placed all his gard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came downe him selfe into the Theater, through high galleries and entrie by the which the common players vsed to come to play their partes in tragedies, insomuche as the ATHENIANS were then worfe affrayed then before: howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their feare, as soone as he beganne to speake vnto them. For he did not facion his Oration with a hasty angrie voyce, neither did he vse any sharpe or bitter wordes: but onely after he had courteously told them their faults and discursie towards him, he sayd he forgaue them, and that he would be their frende againe: and furthermore, he caused tenne millions of bulhells of wheate to be geuen vnto them, and established such Gouernors there, as the people misliked not of. Then Demos the Orator, seeing that the people gaue out great shewes of ioy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators dayly contended in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceede other in preferring newe honors for Demetrius: he caused an order to be made, that the hauens of PIREVS and MYNCHIA should be put into Demetrius hands, to vse at his pleasure. This being established by voyces of the people, Demetrius of his owne priuate authoritie did place a greate garrison within the forte called MYSEVM, because the people should rebell no more against him, nor diuert him from his other enterprises. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to set vpon the LACEDAEONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACEDEMON, came against him with a puissant armie, whom he discomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the cite of MANTINA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his armie, and made an inrode to the cite of SPARTA, where he once againe ouerthrew the LACEDAEONIANS in set battell, rooke fise hundred of them prisoners, and fise two hundred: insomuch that euery man thought he might euen then goe to SPARTA without any danger to take it, the which had neuer yet bene taken affore by any. But there was neuer king that had so often and sodaine changes of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer so often liued, and then great: so sodainly downe, and vp againe: so weake, & straight so strong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduersities when fortune turned so contrarie against him, he was wont to crie out vpon fortune, that which Aeschylus speaketh in a place:

Thou seemst to haue begotten me, of purpose for to shewre Thy force in lifting of me up, me downe againe to shewre.

Nowe againe when his affaires prospered so well, and that he was likely to recouer a greate force and kingdom: newes were brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he helde in ASIA: and on the other side, that Ptolomy had won from him all the realme of CYPRVS, the cite of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very faithfully besieged. This notwithstanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilochus speaketh of, who,

Did in the one hand vnder shewre,

And in the other fire bestowre.

For taking him away, and (as it were) the cite of SPARTA also out of his handes by these dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue won it: he presently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occasion following. After the death of Cassander, Philip who was the eldest of all his other sonnes, and left his heire and successour in the kingdom of MACEDON: he reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceased soone after his father was dead. The two other brethren also fell at great variance, and warres together: so that the one called Antipater, slue his owne mother Thessalonica: and the other being Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius, and Pyrhus, the one out of the realme of EPYRVS, and the other out of PELOPONNESVS. Pyrhus came first before Demetrius, and kept a greate parte of MACEDON for recompence of his paines, comming to aide him at his desire: so that he became a dreadfull neighbour vnto Alexander him selfe, that had sent for him into his contrie. Furthermore, when he was aduertised that Demetrius did presently vpon the receipt of his letters, set forward with all his armie to come to aide him: the young Prince Alexander, was twife as muche more amazed and affrayed, for the great estate and estimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithstanding, and receiued him at a place called Deion, and there embraced and welcomed him. But immediately after, he told him that his affaires were now in so good state, that praised be the goddes he should not now neede his pretence to aide him. After these wordes the one began to mistrust the other. So it chaunced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feast was prepared: there came one to him to tell him of an ambush that was layed for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he should thinke to be merie at the banquet. But Demetrius was nothing abashed at the newes, and only went a litle softlier, not making such hast as he did before, and in the meane time sent to commaunde his Captaines to arme their men, and to haue them in readines: and willed his gentlemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him, (which were a greater number by many than those of Alexanders side) euery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he rose from the table. By this meanes the men whome Alexander had appointed to assault him, they durst not, being affrayed of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at ease at that time to make merie, he went immediately out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keepe him companie, for that he was driuen of necessity to depart from him, and that an other time they would meete together, with better leisure and libertie. Alexander was verie glad to see that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereuppon he brought him into THESSALY, and when they were come to the cite of LARISSA, they began againe to feast one an other, to intrappe eche other: the which offered Demetrius occasion to haue Alexander in his hand, as he willed with him selfe. For Alexander of purpose would not haue his gard about him, fearing least thereby he should teach Demetrius also to stand vpon his gard. Thus Alexander turned his practise for an other, vpon him selfe: for he was determined not to suffer Demetrius to escape his handes, if he once againe came within danger. So Alexander being bidden to supper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius tising from the borde in the middle of supper, Alexander rose also, being affrayed of that straunge manner, and followed him foote by foote to the verie dore. Then Demetrius sayd but to his warders at the gate, kill him that followeth me. With those wordes he went out of the dores, and Alexander that followed him was laine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to rescue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him sayd, that Demetrius had preuented them but one day. All that night, (as it is no other likely) was full of vpror and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the MACEDONIANS being maruelously troubled & affrayed of Demetrius great power, when they saw that no man came to assaile them, but that Demetrius in contrarie manner sent vnto them to tell them that he would speake with them, and deliuer them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be bolde againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Nowe Demetrius needed not to vse many wordes, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto

him: for, because they hated Antipater as a horrible manqueller and murderer of his mother, and because they had no better man to preferre, they easily chose Demetrius king of Macedon, and thereupon brought him backe into Macedon, to take possession of the kingdom. This change was not misliked of the other Macedonians that remained at home in their contrie, for that they yet remembered the traitorous and wicked fact of Cassander, against Alexander the great: for which cause they vtterly hated & detested all his issue & posteritie. And furthermore, if there were any sparke of remembrance in their hearts, of the bounty & goodnes of their grandfather Antipater: Demetrius receiued the frute and benefit, for his wife Phyllis sake, by whom he had a sonne that should succcede him in the kingdom, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius hauing this great good happe and fortune comen vnto him, he receiued newes also that Ptolomy had not onely raised his siege from the cite of Salamina, where he kept his mother and children straightly besieged: but further, that he had done them great honor, and bestowed great giftes vpon them. On the other side also he was aduertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene married vnto Seleucus, was now married againe vnto Antiochus, the sonne of the sayd Seleucus, and how that she was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high prouinces of Asia: and that came to passe in this manner. It chaunced that this young Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercometh all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who alreadie had a sonne by Seleucus his father. She being young, & passing fayer, he was so rauished with her, that though he proued all the wayes possible to maister his furie and passion that way: yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning him selfe to death because he found his desire abominable, his passion incurable, & his reason vtterly overcome: he resolved to kill him selfe by litle and litle, with abstinence from meate and drinke, and made no other reckoning to remedie his griefe, faining to haue some secret inward disease in his body. Yet could he not so finely cloke it, but that Erasistratus the Phisitian easily found his griefe, that loue, not sickness, was his infirmite: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Erasistratus being earnestly bent to finde out the partie he loued, he sate by this young Prince all day long in his chamber, and when any fayer young boy or wife came to see him, he earnestly looked Antiochus in the face, & carefully obserued all the partes of the bodie, and outward mouings, which do commonly bewray the secret passions & affections of the mind. So hauing marked him diuers times, that when others came to see him, whatsoeuer they were, he still remained in one selfe state, and that when Stratonice his mother in lawe came alone or in companie of her husband Seleucus to visite him, he commonly perceiued those signes in him, which Sappho wryteth to be in louers (to wit, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rowled to and fro, and then a sodaine sweate would take him, his pulse would beate fast and rise high, and in the end, that after the force and power of his hart had failed him, and shewed all these signes, he became like a man in an extasie & traunse, & white as a kearcher) he then gathering a true conceiture by these fo manifest signes and declarations, that it was only Stratonice whom this young Prince fanfied, and the which he forced him selfe to keepe secret to the death: thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him muche, but yet trusting to his great affection and fatherly loue he bare to his sonne, he ventred one day to tell him, that his sonnes sickness was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impossible to be enioyed, and therefore that he must of necessitie dye, for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the harte to heare these newes: so he asked him, what, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, answered the Phisitian, because he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe, alas Erasistratus: I haue alwayes loued thee as one of my dearest frendes, and wouldest thou not now doe me this pleasure, to lette my sonne marry thy wife, such thou knowest it will be that I haue no moe sonnes but he, and that I see he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not doe it your selfe, sayd Erasistratus: if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, sayd Seleucus: to him againe, that it were the wil of the gods, some god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne parte, I would not onely leaue him the thing he loued, but I would geue my kingdom also to laue his life. The Erasistratus seeing that the king spake these words from his hart, and with abundance of teares, he tooke him by the right hand, and told him plainly,

A your grace needeth not Erasistratus helpe in this. For being father, husbände, and king, your selfe also may onely be the Phisitian, to cure your sonnes disease. When Seleucus heard that, he called an assemblie of the people, and declared before them all that he was determined to crown his sonne Antiochus king of the high prouinces of Asia, & Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was perswaded that his sonne, (who had alwayes shewed him selfe obedient to his fathers will) would not disobey him in this marriage. And as for Stratonice, if he misliked this marriage, and would not consent vnto it because it was no common matter: then he prayed that his frendes would perswade her he should thinke all good & comely that should please the king, and withall that concerned the general benefit of the realme and common wealth. Hereupon Antiochus and Stratonice were married together. But now to returne againe to the history of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the kingdom of Macedon and Thessalis, by this meane as you haue heard, and did moreouer possesse the best parte of Peloponnesus, and on this side the straight, the cities of Megara, and Athens. Furthermore he led his armie against the Boeotians, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of Thebes with his army, the Boeotians encouraged by the faire wordes and allurements of one Pisfis, borne in the cite of Thespis, who at that time bare all the sway & chiefe authoritie amongst them: they gaue vp their treaty of peace that had begun with Demetrius & determined to make warre. Therupon Demetrius wet to besiege the cite of Thebes, & layed his engines of batterie vnto it: in so much as Cleonymus for feare, stole secretly out of the citie. Therupon the Thebans being also affrayed, yeeled them selues vnto Demetrius mercie: who putting great garrisons into the cities, & hauing leaued a great summe of money of the prouince, left them Hieronymus the historiographer, his Lieutenant & Gouvernor there. So it appeared that he vied them very courteously, & did them many pleasures, and specially vnto Pisfis. For when he had taken him prisoner, he did him no hurt, but receiued him very courteously, and vied him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus, (to wit, campe maister) in the city of Thespis. Shortly after these things were thus brought to passe, king Lysimachus by chaunce was taken by an other barbarous Prince called Dromichetes. Therupon, Demetrius, to take such a notable occasion ofred him, went with a great army to inuade the contry of Thracia, supposing he should find no man to withstande him, but that he might conquer it at his pleasure. Howbeit, so soone as Demetrius backe was turned, the Boeotians reuolted againe from him, & therewithall newes was brought him, that Lysimachus was deliuered out of prison. Then he returned backe with all speede, maruelously offended with the Boeotians, whom he found already discomfited in battell, by his sonne Antigonus, & went againe to lay siege to the cite of Thebes, being the chiefe city of al that prouince of Boeotia. But at that present time, Pyrrhus came & foraged all Thessaly, and entred euen to the straight of Thermopyles. Therefore Demetrius was constrained to leaue his sonne to continewe the siege at Thebes, whilst he him selfe went against Pyrrhus, who sodainly returned againe into his realme. So Demetrius left ten thousand footemen, and a thousand horsemen in Thessaly to defend the contry, & returned with the rest of his army to win Thebes. Therupon he brought his great engine of batterie called E-lepolis, against the wall, as you haue heard before, the which was thrust forward by litle & litle, with great labor, by reason of the weight and heauines of it: so that it could scant be driuen forward two furlongs in two months. But the Boeotians & the Thebans did valiantly defend them selues: & Demetrius of a malicious minde & desire of reuenge, (more often then needefull, or to any purpose) compelled his men to go to the assault, & to hazard them selues: so that there were daily a great number of them slaine. Antigonus his sonne perceivinge it alas, said he, why doe we thus suffer our men to be slaine and cast away to no purpose? Wherefore Demetrius angrily answered him againe: what needest thou to care? Is there any* come to be distributed to those that are dead? But notwithstanding, because men should not thinke he still ment to put others in danger, and durst not venter him selfe: he fought with them, till at length he was shot through the necke with a sharpe arrow head, that was shot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very sicke, but yet raised not his siege, nor removed his campe, but tooke the cite of Thebes againe by assault: the which being not long before againe replenished with people, was in ten yeares space twice won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruelous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his coming into THEBES so that they looked to haue receiued the extreamest punishment the vanquished could haue, through the iust wrath and anger of the conqueror. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirtene of them to death, and banished some he pardoned all the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pythia, in the honour of Apollo: and because the ÆTOLIANS kept all the high wayes to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES in the which of olde time they did vie to celebrate those sports aforesaid: he caused them to be kept & solemnised at ATHENS in a place where this god in reason should be best honored & reuerenced, because he was patron of the citie, and for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACEDON, & knowing that it was against his nature to liue idly, & in peace, & seeing on the other side also that the MACEDONIANS did him more seruice, & were more obedient to him in warres, & that in time of peace they grew seditious, full of vanity & quarrell: he went to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and after he had spoiled and destroyed their contry, he left Pantachus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius him selfe went in the meane time with the rest of his army against Pyrrhus: and Pyrrhus also against him, but they missed of meeting each with other. Whereupon Demetrius passed further vnto the realme of EPHRS, the which he spoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other side went on so farre that he met with Pantachus, Demetrius Lieutenant, with whom he fought a battell, and came to the sword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand, he put Pantachus to flight, & slue a great number of his men, & tooke five thousand prisoners: the which was the chief ouerthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus was north the MACEDONIAN still will so much for the mischieues & hurts he had done vnto them, as he got him selfe great fame & renowne with them, because him selfe alone had with his owne hand done all the noble exploits of warre in that iorney: for the which, he was afterwarde had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS. Nowe many of them began to say, that he was the only king of all others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & vallianties of Alexander the great was to be scene: & that all the rest, (but specially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his graueitie & Princely countenance, like players vpon a stage that would counterfeit his countenance & gesture. And to say truly, there was much finenes and curiosity about Demetrius, to make him a playing stocke in common playes. For some say, that he did not only weare a great hat with his diademe vpon his head, & was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vie to weare certain wollen shooes on his feete dyed in purple colour, not wouen, but facioned together like a felt, and gilt vpon it. And furthermore, he had long before caused a cloke to be made of a maruelous rich & sumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawn the figure of the world, with starres and circles of heauen, the which was not thoroughly finished by the change of his fortune. So, there was neuer king of MACEDON after him that durst weare it: albeit there were many proud & arrogant kings that succeeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not only sorry, and offended to see suche things, as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more misliked this curious manner of life, & specially because he was ill to come to, and worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two yerres, & would geue them no answer: & yet made as though he loned them better, then any other people of GREECE. Another time also he was offended, because the LACEDÆMONIANS had sent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACEDÆMONIANS answer him very gallantly, after the LACONIAN manner. For when Demetrius asked him, how chaficeth it that the LACEDÆMONIANS do send but one man vnto me? No more but one, said he, O king, vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popularlike, then he was wont to do: whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easelier speake with him, and that he would more courteously heare their complaints. Therupon many came, and put vp their humble supplications and bills of petition vnto him. Here receiued them, & put them vp in the lappe of his cloke. The poore suiters were glad of that, and waited

A waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they should quickly be dispatched: but when he was vpon the bridge of the riuer of Axius, he opened his cloke, & cast them all into the riuer. This went to the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought they were no more gouerned by a king, but oppressed by a tyrant: & it grieved the so much more, because they did yet remember (either for that they had scene them selues, or otherwise heard their forefathers say) howe euerous king Philip was in all such matters, and howe that one day as he passed through the streete, a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and effionnes humbly besought him to heare her, but he answered her he was not then at leisure. Whereupon the poore woman plainly cried out to him, leaue then to be king. This word so nettled him, and he tooke such a eodeit of it, that he returned presently to his pallace, & setting all other matters a part, did nothing else many dayes but gaue him selfe to heare all sutes, & began with this poore olde woman. For truly nothing becommeth a Prince better, then to minister iustice: for Mars (as Timotheus saith) significth force, & is a tyrant: but iustice & law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wife Poet Homer saith not that Princes & Kings haue receiued the custody of engines, & of munition, neither also strong & mighty ships of Iupiter, to kepe them to destroy townes withall: but with them to maintaine law & iustice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell & bloody king, but the iust & merciful Prince, Iupiters friend & scholler. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title contrarie vnto Iupiter, whom they called Poleius, or Poliouchos, signifying protector and preferuer of cities: and that he was called Polioretetes, a Fortgainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, & vice preferred for vertue: because he could not discern the truth from falsehood, which turned his iniustice to glory, & iniquity to honor: But now to returne where we left Demetrius fell into a great & daungerous sickenes in the citie of Pella, during which time he almost lost all MACEDON, by a sodaine inuasion Pyrrhus made, who in manner rode it all ouer, & came as farre as the city of EDessa. Howbeit so sone as he recovered health again, he easily draue him out, & afterwards made peace with him, because he would not fighting with him (whom he should haue daily at his dores stil skirmishing somtime here, somtime there) lose the opportunity, and weaken him selfe to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recover all the realmes his father had: & besides, the preparation he made was no lesse sufficient, then the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leauied & assembled an army of a hundred thousand footemen, lacking but two thousand: and vnto them he had also well neere twelve thousand horsemen, & had besides gotten about five hundred shippes together, which were built part in the haue of PIREVS, part at CORINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part about Pella. He him selfe in person went through their workehouses, & shewed the artificers how they should make them, & did help to deuise them: so that euery man wondred not only at his infinite preparation, but at the greatnes & sumptuousnes of his works. For at that time there was no man liuing that euer saw a gally of fiftene or sixtene banks of owers. But this is true, that afterwarde Protemy, surnamed Philopator, built a gally of forty banks of owers, the which was two hundred foure score cubits long, & from the keele in height to the top of the poope, eight & forty cubits: & to looke to the tackle & guide her, required foure hundred mariners, & foure thousand water me to row her, & besides all that the could yet cary about the hatches, wel nere three thousand fighting men. Howbeit this gally neuer serued to other purpose but for show, & was like to a house that neuer sturred: & it was neuer removed out of the place where it was built but with maruelous a do, & great dainger, more to make men wonder at it, then for any seruice or commodity it could be employed vnto. But now, the beawty of Demetrius shippes did nothing hinder their swiftnesse & goodnes for fight, neither did the hugenes of their building take away the vse of them, but their swiftnesse and nimblenes deserued more commendacion, then their sumptuousnes & statelines. Thus as this great power & preparation was in hand, being such as neuer king before (since the time of Alexander the great) had assembled a greater to inuade ASIA: these three kings, Protemy, Seleucus, and Lysimachus, did all foyne together against him. And afterwarde also, they sent Ambassadors vnto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their side, alluring him to come into MACEDON, perswading him not to repose any trust in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of it as a good & sure place for, they said that Demetrius did not giue him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather first tooke opportunity him self to make warre with whom he thought good. Pyrhus considering so much, & finding their words true: there rose a sharpe & cruell warre on euery side against Demetrius, who traded time, & stayed yet to begin. For at one selfe time, Pyolomy with a great flecte of shippes came downe into Greece, & made all Greece reuolt from him: & Lysimachus also on Thraciaes side, & Pyrhus vpon the borders of Epirus, confining with the realme of Macedon, they entred with a great army, & spoiled and sacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leauing his sonne Antigonus in Greece, he returned with all possible speede into Macedon, to goe first against Lysimachus. But as he was preparing to go against him, newes were brought him that Pyrhus had already taken the citie of Berrhoea. This newes being blown abroad amongst the Macedonians, all Demetrius doings were turned topsie turuey. For all his campe was straight full of teares & complaints, & his men began openly to shew their anger against him, speaking all the ill they could of him: so that they would tary no longer, but euery one prayed leaue to depart, pretending to looke to their busines at home, but in truth to go & yeeld them selues vnto Lysimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it best for him to get him as farre from Lysimachus as he could, and to bend all his army against Pyrhus: because the other was their contry man, & familiarly known among the most of them, for that they had serued together vnder Alexander the great, and that as he thought, the Macedonians would not preferre Pyrhus a strainger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him. For as soone as Pyrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the Macedonians that had euer loued valliantes, & had of ancient time esteemed him worthier to be king, that was the best souldier & valliantest in the field, and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency & curteley he had shewed to the prisoners he had taken: they hauing had good will of long time fought but good occasion to forsake Demetrius, & to yeeld them selues vnto Pyrhus, or to any other prince whatsoever he were. Then they secretly began to steale away one after an other, by smal companies at the first: but afterwards there rose such a general tumult against him throughout all the campe, that some of the were so desperat to go into his tent to bid him flie, & saue himselfe, because the Macedonians were too weary with fighting for his curiositie. And yet Demetrius found these words more gentle, & modest, in respect of the vile & cruel words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, & cast a black cloke about his face, in stead of his rich & stately cloke he was wont to weare: not like vnto a king, but like a comon player when the play is done, & then secretly stole away. When this was knowen in the campe, many of his souldiers ran to his tent to rife it, and euery man tooke such hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peces, & drew their swords to fight for it. But Pyrhus coming in the midst of the tumult, pacified this sturre, & presently without blow giuen, wane Demetrius campe: & afterwards he deuided the realme of Macedon with Lysimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly reigned the space of seuen yeres. Now Demetrius being thus miserably ouerthrowen, & turned out of all his realme: he fled vnto the city of Cassandria. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruelous heauily, and could not abide to see him againe a priuate man, driuen out of his kingdom, & the most miserable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, & detesting the fortune of her husband, she being more constant in calamity then in prosperity, killed her selfe with poison she tooke. Demetrius went from thence into Greece, purposing to gather together the rest of his shipwracks: and there assembled all his Capitaines and friends that he had. So it seemeth to me, the coparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the tragedies of Sophocles, in these verses:

*My state doth turne continually about on fortunes wheele, Whose double dealing diuers times infort I am to feele: Resembling right the moone whose face abideth as no stay Two nights together, but doth change in shape from day to day:
At first she riseth small with hornes. And as in age she growes, With fuller cheekes and brighter light a greater face she shewes.
And when she cometh to the full, and shineth faire and bright, Among the goodly glistering starres the goodlyest in the night:*

She fades and falls away againe, and runnes a counterpace; Till she haue forgone the light and figure of her face.

This comparison might I say much better be applied vnto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his ouerthrowe and reliefe againe. For when euery man thought his force and power vnto ouerthrowen, then began he to rise againe by repaire of souldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight reuiued him with good hope. This was the best time that he was euer sence meanely apparelled, like a priuate man vp and downe the country, without some shew or tokens of a king. And there was one that seeing him in this state at Thessaly, pleasantly applied these verses of Euripides vnto him:

*Nowe when he beganne to haue some hope againe, and was (as it were,) entred into the great high way of kinges, and had gotten souldiers about him, which made a bodie and them of royall power: he restored the Thessians their libertie and gouernment againe. But the Athenians once more reuolted from him, and did reuoke the dignitie and Priesthood of Diphilus, who had bene that yere created Priest of the sauiours, in steade of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we haue told you before: and made a lawe, that from thenceforth the auncient and common Gouernours of their citie should be restored againe to their auncient manner: and they sent also into Macedon vnto king Pyrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whome they sawe beginne to rise againe) then for any hope they had* he would come and helpe them. Howbeit Demetrius came against them with great iustice, and did straightly besiege the citie of Athens. Then the Athenians sent Crates, the Philosopher to him, a man of great estimation and authoritie, who so handled him, partly by inuention, and partly also through his wife persuasions and counsells he gaue him for his profit: that Demetrius presently raised his siege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together some shippes as were left him, and had imbarcked twelue thousand footemen, and a small number of horsemen: he presently tooke sea, and sailed towards Asia, meaning to take the prouinces of Caria and Lycia from Lysimachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Eurydice, sister to his wife Phila, receiued him by the citie of Miletum, hauing with her one of Ptolomyes daughters & hers, called Ptolemeide, the which had bene affore affianced to him by Selencus meanes. So he married Ptolemeide there, with the good will and consent of her mother Eurydice. After his marriage he presently went into the field againe, and did set forwardes to winne some citie, whereof many willingly receiued him, and others he tooke by force. Amongst them he tooke the city of Sardis, whether came diuers Capitaines vnto him of king Lysimachus, who yeilded them selues, and brought him a great number of men, and much money besides. But Demetrius receiuing aduertisement that Agathocles, Lysimachus sonne, followed him with a great armie: he went thence into Phrygia, making account, and also hoping, that if he coude winne Armenia, he might easily make Media rebell, and then that he would see if he coude conquer the high prouinces of Asia, where he might haue many places of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agathocles followed him verie neere, and yet skirmishing diuers times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut of his vittells from him euerie waye and kept him at such a straight, that his men durst no more stray from the campe to forrage: wherefore, they suteseyned greate want of vittells, and then beganne his men to be affrayed, and to mistrust that he would make them followe him into Armenia and Media. The famine dayly increased more and more in his armie, and it chaunced besides, that missing his waye, and failing to gage the forde well as he passed ouer the riuier of Lycus, the furie and force of the riuier caried his men downe the streame, and drowned a greate number of them: and yet notwithstanding these greate troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entrie and coming in to his tent, the first verse of the tragedie of Oedipus Colonian, wrytten by Sophocles, chaunging onely

Disperate

But in the end, the plague began also in the midst of this famine, (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessity, it should so be) because that men being driven to neede and necessity, doe frame them selues to eat all that comes to hande: whereupon he was driven to bring backe those few men that remained, hauing lost of all sortes (good and bad) not so few as eight thousand fully told. When he came into the prouince of TARSVS, he commaunded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, because the contrie was subiect vnto king Seleucus, whom he would in no wise displease. But when he sawe it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to such extremitie and neede, & that Agathocles had bard vp the straights and passages of mount Taurus against him: he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, first declaring his miserable state and hard fortune, and then presenting his humble petition and request vnto him, praying him to take pitie vpon his friend, whom spitefull fortune had throwen into such miserie and calamitie, that could not but moue his greatest enemies to haue compassion of him. These letters somewhat softened Seleucus hart, insomuche that he wrote to his Gouvernors and Lieutenantes of those partes, to furnish Demetrius person with all things needefull for a Princes houle, and vittells sufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patroclus, a graue wise man accounted, and Seleucus faithfull friend also, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius souldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therein, & most to be accepted of; but that he did not wisely looke into his affaires, to suffer Demetrius to remaine in his countrie, considering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importance, and now he was brought to such dispaire and extremitie, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowards (contrarie to their nature) to be most desperat & hardie in greatest daungers. Seleucus being moued with these persuasions, presently tooke his iorney into CILICIA with a great armie. Demetrius being allied with this sodaine change, and dreading fo great an armie, got him to the strongest places of mount Taurus. Then he sent vnto Seleucus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereabouts, who liued according to their owne lawes, and neuer had king: to the end that he might yet there with safetie end the rest of his life and exile, staying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly if that liked him not, then that it would ye please him to vittell his men for the winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard harted vnto him as to driue him thence, lacking all needefull things, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall enemies. But Seleucus mistrusting his demaundes, sent vnto him that he should winter if he thought good, two monethes, but no more, in the contrie of CATAONIA, so he gaue him the chiefest of his frendes for ostages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped vp all the wayes & passages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius nowe seeing him selfe kept in of all sides, like a beast to be taken in the toyle: he was driven to trust to his owne strength. Thereupon he ouertanne the contry thereabouts, and as often as it was his chaunce to haue any skirmish or conflict with Seleucus, he had euer the better of him: and sometime also when they draue the armed carkes with fishes against him, he ouercame them, and put the rest to flight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the passages to keepe him that he should not goe into SYRIA, and so kept them him selfe. In fine, finding his mens hartes lift vp againe, and pretily encouraged: his hart also grew so bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Seleucus, and to set all at fixe and seven. So that Seleucus was at a straight with him selfe, and wist not what to doe. For he had returned backe the ayde which Lysimachus sent vnto him, because he was affrayed of him, and mistrusted him. On thother side also he durst not fight with Demetrius alone, being affrayed to venter him selfe with a desperate man: and also mistrusting muche his vnconstant fortune, the which hauing brought him to great extremitie, raised him vp againe to great prosperitie. But in the meane space Demetrius fell into a great sickenesse, the which brought his bodie very weake and low, and had almost vterly ouerthrowen his affaires. For his souldiers, some of them yielded them selues to his enemies, and others stole away without leaue, and went where they listed. Afterwardes when he had hardly recovered his health, and within forty dayes space was pretily grown to strength againe: with those few souldiers that remained with him, he seemed to his enemies, that he would goe and invade CILICIA. But then sodainly in the night without soundung any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way: and hauing passed ouer mount Amanus, he spoyled all the contry vnder it, as farre as the region of CYRENTICA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius sodainly armed his men, and went out by night to assault Seleucus, and to take him sleeping when he mistrusted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his stealing on him but late enough, vntil that certaine traitors of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertise him finding him asleepe, and brought him newes of the daunger he was in. Then Seleucus in a mafe and feare withall, got vp, and founde the alarm: and as he was putting on his hose and making him ready he cryed out, (speaking to his friends and familiars about him) we haue now a cruell and dauntlesse beast to deale with. Demetrius on the other side perceiving by the great flure & noyse he heard in the enemies campe, that his enterprise was discovered: he reryed againe with speede, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offered him battell. Demetrius prepared him selfe to ioyne with him, and hauing giuen one of his faithfull friendes the leading of one of the wings of his armie, him selfe led the other, and ouerthrowe some of his enemies on his side. But Seleucus in the middelt of the battell lighted from his horse, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, and went to the first ranckes of his armie, to make him selfe knowne vnto Demetrius men: perswading them to yeeld them selues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that he had so long time deferred to giue them battell, rather to faue them, then to spare Demetrius. Demetrius souldiers hearing him say so, they did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him for their king, they all yeilded vnto him. Demetrius hauing sundry times before proued fo many chaunges & ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to scape this last also, & to passe it ouer: he fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certaine straights of the mount Amanus. There he founde certaine litle thicke groues, where he determined to stay all night with certaine gentlemen of his house, and a fewe other of his household feruants & officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could possible, to take his way towards the citie of CAVNVS, to goe to that sea coast, hoping to heare of his shippes there. But when it was tolde him he had no vittells nor prouision left onely to serue him that day: he began then to deuise some other way. At length, one of his familiar friends Sofigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred peeces of golde about him in his girdell. So hoping that with the same money he might flie to the sea, they tooke their way by night directly, to the toppe of the mountaine. But when they perceived that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great store of fires hard by them: they then dispaired to passe any further, least they should be scene. So they returned to the selfe same place from whence they came, not all of them, for some of them fled: neither had they that remained any life in them as before. So, one among the rest tooke vpon him, to say, that there was no other way to scape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his sword, and would haue slaine him selfe: but his friends about him would not suffer him, but perswaded him to yeld him selfe vnto Seleucus. Thereupon he sent vnto Seleucus, to tell him that he yelded him selfe vnto him. Seleucus was so ioyfull of the newes, that he sayd it was not Demetrius good fortune that saued him, but his owne: who besides many other happy good turnes she had done him, gaue him yet so honorable occasion and good happe, as to make the world to knowe his clemencie & curtesie. Thereupon immediately he called for his officers of household, and commaunded them to set vp his richest pavilion, and to prepare all things meete to receiue him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleucus Court, who sometime had bene very familiar with Demetrius: Him Seleucus sent immediately vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good chere, and not to be affrayd to come to the king his Maister, for he should find him his very good friend. So soone as the kings pleasure was knowne, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meete him: but afterwards, euery man striued who should goe meete him first, because they were all in hope that he should presently be muche made of, and growe in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gaue occasion also to Demetrius enemies and spitefull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and daungers, saying, that certainly fo soone as the souldiers sawe him, there would grow great sturre and change in their campe. And therefore, shortly after that Apollonides was come vnto Demetrius, being glad to bringe him these good newes, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good words from Seleucus, and that Demetrius him self after so great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to haue yelded his body into his enemies hands) changed his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, & to haue good hope to recouer his state againe: behold, there came one of Seleucus Capitaines called Panfanias, accompanied with a thousand footemen & horsemen in all, who compassed in Demetrius with them, and made the rest depart that were come vnto him before, hauing charge giuen him not to bring him to the Court, but to conuey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whether he was brought, and euer after had a strong garrison about him to keepe him. But otherwise, Seleucus sent him Officers, money, and all things els meete for a Princes house: and his ordinary fare was so delicate, that he could wishe for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of libertie and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his horse in, and also pleasant walks, and goodly arbors to walke or sit in, & fine parkes full of beasts where he might hunt; moreouer, the king suffered his owne household seruants that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other vnto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that so soone as Antiochus & Stratonice were come, they would make some good agreement and peace betwene them. Demetrius remaining in this estate, wrote vnto his sonne Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTHE, & ATHENS, that they should giue no credit to any letters written in his name, though his seale were to them: but that they should keepe the townes they had in charge for his sonne Antigonus, and all the rest of his forces, as if he him selfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captiuitie of his father, he maruelous greuously tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for sorrow, and wrote vnto all the other kings, but vnto Seleucus specially, beseeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, & that he was ready to yeld vp all that he kept, to haue his fathers libertie. The like request did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lysimachus: who promised Seleucus a great summe of money to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no great fancie to Lysimachus, but rather vtterly despised him: did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked request he made vnto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, because he would haue Demetrius deliuered by his sonne Antiochus and Stratonice; meanes, for that Demetrius should be bound to them for his deliuerie, and for euer should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, so did he daily more and more forget the miserie he was in. For first of al, he gaue him selfe to riding and hunting, as farre as the place gaue him libertie. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very grosse, and to giue ouer such pastimes, and therewithall he fell into dronkenness and dying: so that in that sort he passed away the most part of his time, as it should seeme, either to auoid the greuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was sober: or els vnder culler of dronkenness and eating, to shadow the thoughts he had: or els finding in him selfe that it was that manner of life he had long desired, and that through his vaine ambition and follie till that time he could neuer attayne vnto, greatly turmoyleing and troubling him selfe and others, supposing to find in warres, by sea & land, the felicitie and delight which he had found in ease and idlenes, when he nether thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better ende can euill and vnadvised kings and Princes looke for, of all their troubles, daungers, and warres? who in deede deceiue them selues greatly, not onely for that they followe their pleasure and delights as their chiefest felicitie, in steede of vertue and honest life: but also, because that in truth they can not be merry, and take their pleasure as they would. So, Demetrius after he had bene shut vp in CHERRONESVS three yeares together, by ease, grossenes, & dronkenness, fell sicke of a disease whereof he dyed, when he was foure and fiftie yeare old. Therefore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he him selfe also did much repent him that he so suspected him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes curtesie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had so royally and curteously intreated Lysimachus, whom he had taken prisoner in the warres. But yet there was some tragical pompe in the order of his funerall. For his sonne Antigonus vnderstanding that they brought him the ashes of his bodie, he tooke sea with all his shippes, and went to meete them, to receiue them in the Isles: and when he had receiued them, he set vp the funerall pot of golde (in which were his embers) vpon the poope of his Admirall galley. So, all the cities and townes whereby they passed, or harbored, some of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others also sent a number of men thither in mourning apparell, to accompany and honor the conuoye, to the very solemnitie of his funeralls. In this sort sayled all the whole flecte towards the citie of CORINTHVS, the port being plainly scene farre off, standing on the toppe of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged about with purple, and ouer it, the diademe or royall band, and about it also were goodly younge men armed, which were as Pensioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famouslest Musition in that time, being set hard by it, played a sweete and lamentable songe on the flute, wherewithall the ores keeping stroke and measure, the fownd did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuoye where the mourners doe knocke their breastes, at the foote of euery verse. But that which most made the people of CORINTHVS to weepe and lament, which ranne to the peere, and all alongest the shore side to see it: was Antigonus, whom they sawe all beblubored with teares, apparelled as a mourner in blackes. Nowe, after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and nosegayes, and cast them vpon the funerall pot, and had solemnized all the honors possible for the funeralls at CORINTHVS: Antigonus caried away the pot to burye it in the citie of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a newe citie, that had bene replenished with people, and built of litle townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two children by his first wife Phila, to wete, Antigonus, and Stratonice: and two other sonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one furnamed the leane, of a woman of ILYRIA, and the other king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemeide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who liued in ÆGYPT. And it is reported also, that he had another sonne called Corribabus, by his wife Eurydice, and that his posteritie reigned by succession from the father to the sonne, vntil the time of Perseus: who was the last king of MACEDON, whome the ROMANES ouercame by Paulus Aemilius, & wanne all the Realme of MACEDON vnto the Empire of ROME. Now that the MACEDONIAN hath played his part, giue the ROMANES also leaue to come vpon the stage.

ANTONIUS grandfather was that famous Orator whome Marim A flue, bicaufe he tooke Syllas parte. His father was an other Antonius furnamed Cretan*, who was not so famous, nor bare any great sway in the common wealth: howbeit otherwise he was an honest man, and of a very good nature, and specially very liberal in giuing, as appeareth by an acte he did. He was not very wealthie, and therefore his wife would not let him vse his liberallie and francke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to praye him to helpe him to some money, hauing great neede: Antonius by chaunce had no money to giue him, but he commaunded one of his men to bringe him some water in a siluer basen, & after he had brought it him, he washed his beard as though he ment to haue shauen it, and then found an arrant for his man to send him out, and gaue his friend the siluer basen, and bad him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great sturre in the house among the seruaunts, seeking out this siluer basen. Inasmuch as Antonius seeing his wife maruelously offended for it, & that she would examine all her seruants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it: at length he confessed he had giuen it away, & prayed her to be contented. His wife was Julia, of the noble house and familie of Julius Caesar: who for her vertue & chastitie, was to be compared with the noblest Lady of her time. M. Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being married after her first husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus, and others, for that he was of Catlines conspiracie against the common wealth. And this seemeth to be the originall cause and beginning of the cruell and mortal hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius selfe sayth, that he would neuer giue him the body of his father in law to bury him, before his mother went first to intreat Ciceroes wife the which vndoubtedly was a flat lye. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them, whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a fayer younge man, and in the prime of his youth: he fell acquainted with Curio, whose friendship and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a dissolute man, giuen ouer to all lust and insolencie, who to haue Antonius the better at his commaundement, trayned him on into great follies, and vaine expences Apon women, in rioting & banketing. So that in shorttime, he brought Antonius into a mar-uelous great det, & too great for one of his yerres, to wete: of two hundred & fifty talents, for all which summe Curio was his fuerie. His father hearing of it, did put his sonne from him, and forbad him his house. Then he fell in with Clo dius, one of the desperatest and most wicked Tribunes at that time in Rome. Him he followed for a time in his desperate attempts, who bred great sturres and mischief in Rome: but at length he forsooke him, being weary of his rashnes and folly, or els for that he was afraid of them that were bent against Clo dius. There-vpon he left Italy, and went into Greece, and there bestowed the most parte of his tyme, sometime in warres, and otherwhile in the studie of eloquence. He vied a manner of phrase in his speeche, called Asiatick, which caried the best grace and estimation at that time, and was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of ostentation, foolie, brauerie, and vaine ambition. After he had remayned there some tyme, Gabinus Proconsul going into Syria, perswaded him to goe with him. Antonius tolde him he would not goe as a priuate man Wherefore Gabinus gaue him charge of his horsemen, and so tooke him with him. So first of all he sent him against Aristobulus, who had made the Iewes to rebell, & was the first man him selfe that got vp to the wall of a castell of his, and so draue Aristobulus out of all his holds: and with those few men he had with him, he ouercame al the Iewes in set battell, which were many against one, and put all of them almost to the sword, and furthermore, tooke Aristobulus him selfe prisoner with his sonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of Egypt, that had bene driuen out of his contry, went vnto Gabinus to intreate him to goe with his armie with him into Egypt, to put him againe into his kingdom: and promised him if he would goe with him, tenne thousand talents. The most part of the Captaines thought it not best to goe thither, & Gabinus him selfe made it daintie to enter into this warre: although the couetousnes of these tenne thousand talents stucke sorely with him. But Antonius that sought but for opportunitie and good occasion to attempt great enterprises, and that desired also to gratifie Ptolomyes request: he went about to perswade Gabinus to goe this voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they should goe, to cometo the cite of Pelusiym, then they feared any daunger of the warre besides: bicaufe they were to passe through deepe sandes & desert places, where was no freshe water to be had all the marishes thorough, which are called the marishes Serponides, which the Egyptians call the exhalations of fume, by the which the Gyants Typhon D breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red sea, which breaketh out vnder the ground in that place, where it is deuided in the narrowest place from the sea on this side. So Antonius was sent before into Egypt with his horsemen, who did not onely winne that passage, but also tooke the cite of Pelusiym (which is a great cite) with all the souldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it safe for all the rest of the armie, and the hope of the victorie also certaine for his Captaine. Nowe did the enemies them selues feele the frutes of Antonius curtesie, and the desire he had to winne honor. For when Ptolomy after he had entred into the cite of Pelusiym for the malice he bare vnto the cite, would haue put all the Egyptians in it to the sword: Antonius with tooke him, & by no meanes would suffer him to do it. And in all other great battells and skirmishes which they fought, and were many in number, Antonius did many noble actes of a valliant and wise Captaine: bes specially in one battell, where he compassed in the enemies behind, giuing them the victorie that fought against them, whereby he afterwards had such honorable reward, as his vallianenes deserved. So was his great curtesie also much commended of all, the which he shewed vnto Archelaus. For hauing bene his very friend, he made warre with him against his will while he liued: but after his death he fought for his bodye, and gaue it honorable buriall. For these respects he wanne him selfe great fame of them of Alexandria, and he was also thought a worthy man of all the souldiers in the Romanes campe. But besides all this, he had a noble presence, and shewed a countenance of one of a noble house: he had a goodly thicke beard, abroad forehead, crooke nosed, and there appeared such a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly seene in Hercules pictures, stamped or grauen in mettell. Now it had bene a speeche of old time, that the familie of the Antony were descended from one Antony, the sonne of Hercules, whereof the familie tooke name. This opinion did Antonius seeke to confirme in all his doings: not onely resembling him in the likenes of his bodye, as we haue sayd before, but also in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly shewe him selfe abroad before many people, he would alwayes weare his cassocke gyrt downe lowe vpon his hippes, with a great sword hanging by his side, and vpon that, some ill fauored cloke. Furthermore, things that seeme intollerable in other men, as to boast commonly, to ieast with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with euery body, to sit with the souldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them souldierlike: it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wanne him amongst them. And furthermore, being giuen to loue: that made him the more desired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further euery mans loue, and also would not be angry that men should merily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and aduancement, was his liberalitie, who gaue al to the souldiers, and kept nothing for him selfe: and when he was grown to great credit, then was his authoritie and power also very great, the which notwithstanding him selfe did ouerthrowe, by a showe of other faults he had. In this place I will shewe you one example onely of his wonderfull liberalitie. He commaunded one day his coferer that kept his money, to giue a friend of his 25. Myriades: which the ROMANES call in their tongue, Decies. His coferer marueling at it, and being angry withall in his minde, brought him all this money in a heape together, to shewe him what a maruelous masse of money it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: his coferer answered him, it was the money he willed him to giue vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiving the spight of his man, I thought, sayd he, that Decies had bene a greater summe of money then it is, for this is but a triffle: and therefore he gaue his friend as much more another tyme, but that was afterwarde. Nowe the ROMANES mainteyning two factions at ROME at that tyme, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate, did ioyne with Pompey being then in ROME: and the contrary side taking part with the people, sent for Caesar to ayde them, who made warres in GAYLE. Then Curio Antonius friend, that had changed his garments, and at that tyme tooke parte with Caesar, whose enemy he had bene before: he wanne Antonius, and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit and swaye he bare amongst the people, by reason of his eloquent tongue: and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Caesar gaue him: that Antonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtheraunce to Caesars practises. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune, he did oppose him selfe against those things which the Consul Marcellus preferred: (who ordeyned that certaine legions which had bene already leauied and billed, should be giuen vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commission and authoritie to leaue others vnto them) and set downe an order, that the souldiers which were already leauied and assembled, should be sent into SYRIA, for a newe supplie vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that tyme against the PARTHIANS. And furthermore, prohibition that Pompey should leaue no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Caesars letters to be receiued, and openly red in the Senate: Antonius hauing power and warrant by his person, through the holines of his tribuneship, did read them openly, and made diuers men change their mindes: for it appeared to them that Caesar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of consideration vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey, or Caesar, should leaue their armie: there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey should leaue his armie, but they all in manner commaunded Caesar to doe it. Then Antonius rising vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Caesar both, should leaue their armies. Thereunto all the Senators ioyntly together gaue their whole consent, and with a great cry commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. But the Consuls would not allowe of that. Therefore Caesars friendes preferred other reasonable demands and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made greuous curses against him. After that, he tooke a slaues gowne, and speedily fled to Caesar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hyered coach. When they came to Caesar, they cryed out with open mouth, that all went hand Antonius Tribune of the people, and Augure.

Antonius ally for Caesar.

Antonius flyeth from Rome vnto Caesar.

A ouer head at ROME: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their mindes, and were driuen away in great daunger of their liues, as many as stood with lawe and iustice. Hereupon Caesar incontinently went into ITALY with his army, which made Cicero lay in his Philipides: that as Hellen was cause of the warre of TROY, so was Antonius the author of the ciuill warres, which in deede was a starke lye. For Caesar was not so fickle headed, nor so easily caried away with anger, that he would so sodainly haue gone and made warre with his contrary, vpon the sight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled vnto him in miserable apparell, and in a hyered coach: had he not long before determined it with him selfe. But first is deede Caesar looked of long time but for some culler, this came as he wished, and gaue him iust occasion of warre. But to say truly, nothing els moued him to make warre with all the world as he did, but one selfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him: to wit, an insatiable desire to raigne, with a senseles countenance to be the best man in the world, the which he could not come vnto, before he had first put downe Pompey, and vterly ouerthrowen him. Now, after that Caesar had gotten ROME at his commaundement, & had driuen Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed first to goe into SPAYNE, against the legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make prouision for shippes and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his absence, he left Lepidus that was Prator, gouernour of ROME: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue him charge of all the souldiers, and of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight maruelously commended and beloued of the souldiers, because he commonly exercised him self among them, and would oftentimes eate and drinke with them, and also be liberal vnto them, according to his abilitie. But then in contrary manner, he purchafed diuers other mens euill willes, because that through negligence he would not doe them iustice that were injured, & deli very churlishly with them that had any sute vnto him: and besides all this, he had an ill name to iustise mens wiuers. To conclude, Caesars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cause why they hated Caesars gouernment (which in deede in respect of him selfe was no lesse then a tyrannie) by reason of the great insolencies & outrageous parts that were committed: amongst whom Antonius, that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest fautes, deserued most blame. But Caesar notwithstanding, when he returned from the warres of SPAYNE, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp against him: but contrarily, because he found him a hardy man, & a valliant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefe affayres, and was not whit deceiued in his opinion of him. So he passed ouer the IONIAN sea vnto BRINDVSIVM, being but slenderly accompanied: & sent vnto Antonius & Gabinus, that they should imbarke their men as soone as they could, and passe them ouer into MACEDON. Gabinus was affrayd to take the sea, because it was very roughe, and in the winter time: & therefore fetched a great compasse about by land. But Antonius fearing some daunger might come vnto Caesar, because he was compassed in with a great number of enemies: first of all he draue away Libo, who roade at anker with a great armie, before the haven of BRINDVSIVM. For he manned out such a number of pynnaces, barks, and other small boates about euery one of his gallies, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into shippes twenty thousand footemen, and eght hundred horsemen, and with this armie he boyled sayle. When the enemies sawe him, they made out to followe him: but the sea rose so highe, that the billowes purbake their gallies that they could not come neare him, and so he escaped that daunger. But withall he fell vpon the rocks with his whole flecte, where the sea wrought very highe: so that he was out of all hope to saue him selfe. Yet by good fortune, sodainly the winde turned South-west, and blew from the gulfie, driuing the waues of the riuer into the mayne sea. Thus Antonius loosing from the lande, and sayling with safetie at his pleasure, soone after he sawe all the coastes full of shippewracks. For the force and boylerousnes of the winde, did cast away the gallies that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and diuers also cast away, and Antonius tooke a great number of them prisoners, with a great summe of money also. Besides all thes, he tooke the cite of LYSSVS, and brought Caesar a great supplie of men, and made him coragious, comming at a pynche with so great a power to him. Now there were diuers hotte skymishes and encounteres, in the which Antonius fought so valliantly, that he caried the prayle from them all: but specially at two severall tymes, Cicero reproved for lying.

when Cæsars men turned their backs, & fled for life. For he stepped before them, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: for that the victorie fell on Cæsars side. For this cause he had the seconde place in the campe amongst the fouldiers, and they spake of no other man vnto Cæsar, but of him: who shewed playnely what opinion he had of him, when at the last battell of PARSALIA (which in deede was the last tryall of all, to giue the Conqueror the whole Empire of the worlde) he him selfe did leade the right wing of his armie, and gaue Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valliantest man, and skilfullest fouldier of all those he had about him. After Cæsar had wonne the victorie, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey steppe by steppe: howbeit before, he named Antonius general of the horsemen, and sent him to ROME. The generall of the horsemen is the second office of dignitie, when the Dictator is in the citie: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefest man, and almost the onely man that remaineth, and all the other officers and Magistrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator chosen. Notwithstanding, Dolabella being at that tyme Tribune, and a younge man desirous of change and innouation: he preferred a law which the ROMANES call Nouas tabulas (as much to saye, as a cutting of and cancelling of all obligations and specialities, & were called the newe tables, because they were diuen then to make bookes of daily receit and expence) and perswaded Antonius his friend (who also gaped for a good occasion to please and gratifie the common people) to aide him to passe this lawe. But Trebellius & Asinius dissuaded from it al they could possible. So by good hap it chaunced that Antonius mistrusted Dolabella for keeping of his wife, and tooke such a conceite of it, that he thrust his wife out of his house being his Cousin Germane, & the daughter of C. Antonius, who was Consul with Cicero: & ioyning with Asinius, he resisted Dolabella, & fought with him. Dolabella had gotten the market place where the people doe assemble in counsell, & had filled it full of armed men, intending to haue this law of the newe tables to passe by force. Antonius by commandement of the Senate, who had giuen him authoritie to leauy men, to vse force against Dolabella: he went against him, & fought fo valiantly, that men were slaine on both sides. As by this meanes, he got the ill will of the comon people, & on the other side, the noble men (as Cicero saith) did not onely mislike him, but also hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banquettes & dronke feasts he made at vnseasonable times, & his extreme wastfull expences vpon vaine light huswiues, & then in the day time he would sleepe or walke out his drunkenness, thinking to weare away the fume of the abondance of wine which he had taken oute that night. In his house they did nothing but feast, daunce, & maske: and him selfe passed away the time in hearing off foolish plays, or in marrying these plaieres, tombleres, iesters, & such sort of people. As for profe hereof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his iesters, he drank wine so lustely all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people assembled in counsell, who had sent for him: he being queise stomaked with his surfeit he had taken, was compelled to lay all before them, & one of his friends held him his gowne in stead of a basen. He had another pleasaunt player called Sergius, that was one of the chiefest men about him, & a woman also called Cytheride, of the same profession, whom he loued derely: he caried her vp & downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, & had as many men waiting upon her litter, as the being but a player, as were attending vpon his owne mother. It greued honest men also very much, to see that when he went into the contry, he caried with him a great number of cubbords full of siluer & gold plate, openly in the face of the world, as it had ben the pompe or shewe of some triumphe: & that oftfoones in the midst of his iorney he would set vp his hailes and tents hard by some greene groue or pleasaunt riuer, and there his Cookes should prepare him a sumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lyons were harnesed in traves to drawe his carts: and besides also, in honest mens houses in the cities where he came, he would haue common harlots, curtisans, & these tumbling gillots lodged. Now it greued men much, to see that Cæsar should be out of ITALY following of his enemies, to end this great warre, with such great perill and danger: and that others in the meane time abusing his name and authoritie, should commit such insolent and outrageous parts vnto their Citizens. This me thinkes was the cause that made the conspiracie against Cæsar increase more and more, and layed the reynes of the brydle vpon the fouldiers neckes, whereby they durst bouldier commit many extorsions, extorsions, cruelties and robberies: And therefore Cæsar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, & being created Consul the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but chose Lepidus, his colleague and fellow Consul. Afterwards when Pompeys house was put to open sale, Antonius bought in but when they asked him money for it, he made it very straunge, and was offended with them, and writeth him selfe that he would not goe with Cæsar into the warres of AFRICA, because he was not well recompensed for the seruice he had done him before. Yet Cæsar did somewhat bridle his madnes and insolencie, not suffering him to passe his faulte so lightly away, making as though he sawe them not. And therefore he left his dissolute manner of life, and married Fulvia that was Clodius widowe, a woman not so basely minded to spend her time in spinning and housewifery, and was not contented to master her husband at home, but would also rule him in his office abroad, and commaund him, that commaunded legions and great armies: so that Cleopatra was to giue Fulvia thanks for that she had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned so well to be at their commandement. Nowe, because Fulvia was somewhat fower, and crooked of condition, Antonius deuiled to make her pleasaunter, & somewhat better disposed: and therefore he would playe her many pretty youthfull partes to make her mery. As he did once, when Cæsar returned the last time of all Conqueror out of SPAYNE, euery man went out to meete him: and so did Antonius with the rest. But on the fownde there ranne a rumor through ITALY, that Cæsar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great armie. Thereupon he returned with speede to ROME, and tooke one of his mens gownes, and so apparelled came home to his house in a darke night, saying that he had brought Fulvia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her mislaid as he was, for being known: but the taking the matter heauily, asked him if Antonius were well, Antonius gaue her the letters, and sayd neuer a word. So when she had opened the letters, and beganne to read them: Antonius ramed of her necke, and kissed her. We haue told you this tale for examples sake onely, and so could we also tell you of many such like as these. Nowe when Cæsar was returned from his last warre in SPAYNE, all the chiefest nobilitie of the citie road many dayes iorney from ROME to meete him, where Cæsar made maruelous much of Antonius, aboute all the men that came vnto him. For he alwayes tooke him into his coche with him, through out all ITALY: and behind him, Brutus Albinus, and Octavianus, the sonne of his Nece, who afterwards was called Cæsar, and became Emperor of ROME a long time after.

D So Cæsar being afterwards chosen Consul the fift time, he immediatly chose Antonius his colleague and companion: and desired by depositing him selfe of his Consulship, to make Dolabella Consul in his roome, and had already moued it to the Senate. But Antonius did stowly withstand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in the Senate: and Dolabella also spared him as little. Thereupon Cæsar being ashamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time also when Cæsar attempted againe to substitute Dolabella Consul in his place, Antonius cryed out, that the signes of the birdes were against it: so that at length Cæsar was compelled to giue him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was maruelously offended with him. Now in truth, Cæsar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cæsar answered one that did accuse Antonius and Dolabella vnto him for some matter of conspiracie: thus he said, they be not those fat fellows and fine comed men that I feare, but I mistrust rather these pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Cassius, who afterwards conspired his death, and slue him.

*Antonius vnwares afterwards gaue Cæsars enemies iust occasion and culler to doe as they did: as you shall heare. The ROMANES by chance celebrated the feast called Lupercalia, & Cæsar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was set in the Tribune where they vse to make their orations to the people, and from thence did behold the sport of the runners. The manner of this running was this. On that day there are many young men of noble house, and those specially that be chiefe Officers for that yeare: who running naked vp & downe the citie, annoynted with the oyle of olyue, for pleasure do strike them they meete in their way, with white leather thongs they haue in their hands. Antonius being one amonge the rest that was to runne, leauing the auncient ceremonies & old customes of that solemnitie: he ranne to the Tribune where Cæsar was set, and caried a laurell crowne in his hand, hauing a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the auncient marke and token of a king. When he* was come to Cæsar, he made his fellow ronnars with him lift him vp, & so he did put this laurell crowne vpon his head, signifying thereby that he had deserved to be king. But Cæsar making as though he refused it, turned away his heade. The people were so reioyced at it, that they all clapped their hands for ioy. Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cæsar againe refused it, and thus they were struing of and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurell crowne vnto him, a few of his followers reioyced at it: & as oft also as Cæsar refused it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they suffered all things subjects should doe by commaundement of their kings: & yet they could not abide the name of a king, detesting it as the vtter destruction of their liberty. Cæsar in a rage rose out of his seate, and plucking downe the choller of his gowne from his necke, he shewed it naked, bidding any man strike of his head that would. This laurell crowne was afterwards put vpo the head of one of Cæsars statues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt of. The people liked his doing therein so well, that they wayted on him home to his house, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cæsar did turne the out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragement for Brutus & Cassius to conspire his death, who fel into a cōsort for their trustiest friends, to execute their enterprise: but yet stood doubtful whether they should make Antonius priuy to it or not. All the rest liked of it, sauing Trebonius only. He told them, that when they rode to meete Cæsar at his returne out of SPAYNE, Antonius & he alwaies keeping company, & lying together by the way, he felt his mind a farre off but Antonius finding his meaning, would barken no more vnto it, & yet notwithstanding neuer made Cæsar acquainted with this talke, but had faithfully kept it to him self. After that they cōsulted whether they should kil Antonius with Cæsar. But Brutus would in no wise consent to it, saying: that venturing on such an enterprise as that, for the maintenance of law & iustice, isought to be cleere from all villanie. Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authoritie of his office, appointed certain of the cōspiracy, that when Cæsar were gone into the Senate, and while others should execute their enterprise, they should keepe Antonius in a talke out of the Senate house. Euen as they had deuised these matters, so were they executed: and Cæsar was slaine in the middelt of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, cast a slaues gowne vpon him, and hid him selfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murderers slue no man els, and that they went onely into the Capitoll: he sent his sonne vnto them for a pledge, & bad them boldly come downe vpon his word. The selfe same day he did bid Cassius to supper, and Lepidus also bad Brutus. The next morning the Senate was assembled, & Antonius him selfe preferred a lawe that all things past should be forgotten, and that they should appoint prouinces, vnto Cassius and Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, & further ordeyned, that they should cancell none of Cæsars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more prayed, and better esteemed, then euer man was: because it seemed to euery man that he had cut of all occasion of ciuill warres, and that he had shewed him selfe a maruelous wise gouernor of the common wealth, for the appeasing of these matters of so great waight & importance. But nowe, the opinion he conceiued of him selfe after he had a litle felt the good will of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make him selfe the chieftest man if he might ouercome Brutus: did easily make him alter his first mind. And therefore when Cæsars body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a funeral oration in cōmendacion of Cæsar, according to the auncient custom of praising noble men at their funerals. When he saw that the people were very glad and desirous also to heare Cæsar spoken of, & his praises vttered: he mingled his oration with lamentable wordes, and by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their harts and affections vnto pittie & compassion. In fine to conclude his oration, he vnfolded before the whole assembly the bloudy garments of the dead, thrust through in many places with their swords, & called the malefactors, cruell & cursed murderers. With these wordes he put the people into such a fury, that they presently toke Cæsars body, & burnt it in the market place, with such tables & fourmes as they could get together. Then whē the fire was kindled, they toke firebrands, & ran to the murderers houses to set the afire, & to make the come out to fight. Brutus therefore & his accomplices, for safety of their persons were driue to fly the city. Then came all Cæsars friends vnto Antonius, & specially his wife Calpurnia putting her trust in him, she brought the moste part of her money into his

his house, which amounted to the summe of foure thousand talents, & furthermore brought him all Cæsars bookes & writings, in the which were his memorials of al that he had done & ordeyned. Antonius did daily mingle with them such as he thought good, and by that meanes he created newe officers, made newe Senators, called home some that were banished, and deliuered those that were prisoners: and then he sayde that all those things were so appoynted and ordeyned by Cæsar. Therefore the ROMANES mocking them that were so moued, they called them CHARONITES: because that when they were ouercome, they had no other helpe but to saye, that thus they were found in Cæsars memorials, who had layed in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, because he was Consul, and Cicero one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now things remayning in this state at ROME, Octavius Cæsar the younger came to ROME, who was the sonne of Iulius Cæsars Nece, as you haue heard before, and was left his lawefull heire by will, remayning at the tyme of the death of his great Vncle that was slayne, in the citie of APOLLONIA. This young man at his first arriual went to salute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cæsars friendes, who by his last will and testament had made him his heire: and withall, he was presently in hande with him for money and other things which were left of trust in his handes, because Cæsar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of ROME, three score and fiftene siliuer Drachmas to be giuen to euery man, the which he as heire stood charged withall. Antonius at the first made no reckoning of him, because he was very young: and sayde he lacked witte, and good friendes to aduise him, if he looked to take such a charge in hande, as to vndertake to be Cæsars heire. But when Antonius saw that he could not shake him of with those wordes, and that he was still in hande with him for his fathers goods, but specially for the ready money: then he spake and did what he could against him. And first of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and also when Octavius Cæsar beganne to meddle with the dedicating of the chayer of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honor Cæsar with: he threatened to send him to prison, and moreover desired not to put the people in an vprore. This young Cæsar seeing his doings, went vnto Cicero and others, which were Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fauor with the Senate: and he him self sought the peoples good will euery manner of way, gathering together the olde souldiers of the late deceased Cæsar, which were dispersed in diuers cities and colonyes. Antonius being afraid of it, talked with Octavius in the capitoll, and became his friend. But the very same night Antonius had a straunge dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, & burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cæsar lay in waite to kil him. Cæsar cleered him selfe vnto him, and told him there was no such matter: but he could not make Antonius beleue the contrary. Whereuppon they became further enemies then euer they were in so much that both of them made friends of either side to gather together all the old souldiers through ITALY, that were dispersed in diuers townes: & made them large promises, & sought also to winne the legions of their side, which were already in armes. Cicero on the other side being at that time the chieftest man of authoritie & estimation in the citie, he stirred vp al me against Antonius: so that in the end he made the Senate pronouce him an enemy to his contry, & appointed young Cæsar Sergeants to cary axes before him, & such other signes as were incident to the dignitie of a Consul or Prætor: & moreover sent Helcius and Pansa, then Consuls, to driue Antonius out of ITALY. These two Consuls together with Cæsar, who also had an armye, went against Antonius that besegged the citie of MODENA, and there ouerthrew him in battell: but both the Consuls were slaine there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrowe, fell into great miserie al at once: but the chieftest want of all other, & that pinched him most, was famine. Howbeit he was of such a strong nature, that by patience he would ouercome any aduersitie, and the heauier fortune lay vpon him, the more constant shewed he him selfe. Euery man that felt he want or aduersitie, knoweth by vertue and discretion what he should doe: but when in deede they are ouerlaid with extremitie, and be fore oppressed, few haue the harts to follow that which they praise and commend, and much lesse to auoid that they reprove and mislike. But rather to the contrary, they yield to their accustomed easie life: and through sayne hart, & lacke of corage, doe chaunge their first mind and purpose. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the souldiers, to see Antonius that was brought vp in all finenes and superfluities, & easily to drinke puddle water, and to cate wild frutes and rootes: and moreover it is reported, that euen as they passed the Alpes, they did cate the barkes of trees, and such beasts, as neuer man tasted of his flesh before. Now their intent was to ioyne with the legions that were on the other side of the Mountaines, vnder Lepidus charge: who Antonius tooke to be his friend, bicause he had holpen him to many things at Cæsars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he saw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter him selfe, and to goe vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at Modena, he suffred his beard to grow at length and neuer clypt it, that it was maruelous long, and the heare of his heade also without coming: and besides all this, he went in a mourning gowne, and after this sort came hard to the trenches of Lepidus campe. Then he beganne to speake vnto the souldiers, and many of them their hartes yerned for pitie to see him so poorly arrayed, and some also through his wordes beganne to pitie him: insomuch that Lepidus beganne to be affrayd, and therefore commaunded all the tromperts to fownd together to stoppe the souldiers eares, that they should not harken to Antonius. This notwithstanding, the souldiers tooke the more pitie of him, & spake secretly with him by Clodius & Lalius meanes, whom they sent vnto him disguised in womens apparel, & gaue him counsel that he should not be affraid to enter into their campe, for there were a great number of souldiers that would receiue him, and kill Lepidus, if he would say the word. Antonius would not suffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a ford, at a litle riuier that ranne betwene them: and him selfe was the foremost man that tooke the riuier to get ouer, seeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their handes, plucked vp the stakes, and layed flat the bancke of their trench to let him in to their campe. When he was come into their campe, and that he had all the army at his commaundement: he vied Lepidus very courteously, imbraced him, and called him father: and though in deepe Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and honor of the Captaine. Munatius Plancus, lying allo in campe hard by with an army: vnderstanding the report of Antonius curtesie, he also came and ioined with him. Thus Antonius being a foote againe, and grown of great power, repassed ouer the Alpes, leading into Italy with him seuentene legions, and tenne thousand horsemen, besides six legions he left in garison amonge the Gaulles, vnder the charge of one Varus, a companion of his that would drinke lustily with him, and therefore in mockery was surnamed Cotylon: to wit, a bibber. So Octavius Caesar would not leane to Cicero, when he saw that his whole trauail and endeuor was onely to restore the common wealth to her former libertie. Therefore he sent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together, (to wete, Caesar, Antonius, & Lepidus) in an Iland enuyroned round about with a litle riuier, & there remaind three dayes together. Now as touching all other matters, they were easily agreed, & did deuide all the Empire of Rome betwene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for euery one of them would kill their enemies, and saue their kinsmen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their greedy desire to be reuenged of their enemies, they spumed all reuerence of blood, and holines of friendship at their feete. For Caesar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius also forooke Lucius Caesar, who was his Vncle by his mother: and both of them together suffred Lepidus to kill his owne brother Paulus. Yet some writers affirme, that Caesar & Antonius requested Paulus might be slaine, & that Lepidus was contented with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnatural, & crueller change then this was. For thus chaunging murder for murder, they did aswell kill those whom they did forsake & leaue vnto others, as those also which others left vnto them to kill: but so much more was their wickednes & cruelly great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, & hauing no cause to hate them. After this plat was agreed vpon betwene the souldiers that were thereabouts, would haue this friendship & league betwix them confirmed by marriage, & that Caesar should marry Claudia, the daughter of Fulvia, & Antonius wife. This marriage also being agreed vpon, they condoned three hundred of the chieft citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proscripō. And Antonius also coma-

And the to who he had geuen cōmission to kill Cicero, that they should strik of his head & right hand, with the which he had written the inuective Orations (called Philippides) against Antonius. So whe the murderers brought him Ciceros head & hand cut of, he beheld them a long time with great ioy, & laughed hartly, & that oftentimes for the great ioy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleasure of the sight of them, he caused them to be set vp in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations (where when he was aloue, he had often spoken to the people) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not bleamished his owne fortune, shewing him selfe (to his great shame and infamie) a cruell man, and vnworthie the office and authoritie he bare. His vncle Lucius Caesar also, as they fought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fledde vnto his sister. The murderers coming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, she stood at her chamber dore with her armes abroade, crying out still: you shall not kill Lucius Caesar, before you first kill me, that bare your Captaine in my wombe. By this meanes she saued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of these Triumvirs grewe odious and hateful to the Romans, for diuers respects: but they most blamed Antonius, bicause he being elder then Caesar, and of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue him selfe againe to his former rior and excesses, when he left to deale in the affaires of the common wealth. But setting aside the ill name he had for his insolencie, he was yet much more hated in respect of the house he dwelt in, the which was the house of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperance, modestie, and ciuill life, as for his three triumphs. For it grieved them to see the gates commonly shut against the Capitaines, Magistrates of the citie, and also Ambassadors of strange nations, which were sometimes thrust from the gate with violence: and that the house within was full of tombles, anticke dauncers, iuglers, players, iesters, and dronkards, quaffing and gofeling, and that on them he spent and bestowed the most parte of his money he got by all kind of possible extorsions, bribetrie and policie. For they did not onely sell by the crier, the goods of those whom they had outlawed, and appointed to murder, slanderously deceiued the poore widowes and young orphans, & also raised all kind of imposts, subsidies, and taxes: but vnderstanding also that the holy vestall Nunnes had certaine goods & money put in their custodie to keepe, both of mens in the citie, and those also that were abroade: they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octavius Caesar perceiving that no money would serue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the money betwene them, and so did they also deuide the armie, for them both to goe into Macedon to make warre against Brutus and Cassius: and in the meane time they left the gouernment of the citie of Rome vnto Lepidus. When they had passed ouer the seas, and that they beganne to make warre, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius against Cassius, and Caesar against Brutus: Caesar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. For at the first battell Caesar was ouerthrowen by Brutus, and lost his campe, and verie hardly saued him selfe by flying from them that followed him. Howebeit he writeth him selfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was geuen, bicause of a dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other side ouerthrowe Cassius in battell, though some write that he was not there him selfe at the battell, but that he came after the ouerthrowe, whilst his men had the enemies in chase. So Cassius at his earnest request was slaine by a faithfull seruant of his owne called Pindarius, whom he had enfranchised: bicause he knewe not in time that Brutus had ouercomen Caesar. Shortly after they fought an other battell againe, in the which Brutus was ouerthrowen, who afterwards also slue him selfe. Thus Antonius had the chieft glorie of all this victorie, specially bicause Caesar was sicke at that time. Antonius hauing found Brutus body after this battell, blaming him muche for the murder of his brother Caes, whom he had put to death in Macedon for reuenge of Ciceros cruell death, and yet laying the fault more in Horrensus then in him: he made Horrensus to be slaine on his brothers tombe. Furthermore, he cast his coate armor (which was wonderfull rich and sumptuous) vpon Brutus bodie, and gaue commaundement to one of his slaues enfranchised, to defray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards, Antonius hearing that his enfranchised bondman had not burnt his coate armor with his bodie, bicause it was verie riche, and worth a great summe of money, and that he had also kept backe much of the ready money appointed for his funerall & tombe: he also put him to death.

After that Cæsar was conueied to ROME, and it was thought he would not liue long, nor cease the sickenes he had. Antonius on thother side went towards the East provinces and regions, to leaue money: and first of all he went into GREECE, and caried an infinite number of soldiers with him. Now, bicause euery souldier was promised fiewe thousande siluer Drachmas, he was driuen of necessitie to impose extreame tallages and taxacions. At his first coming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter vnto the GRECIANS, but gaue him selfe onely to heare wife men dispute, to see playes, and also to note the ceremonies & sacrifices of GREECE, ministring iustice to euery man, and it pleased him maruelously to heare them call him Phil-ellen, (as much to say, a louer of the GRECIANS) and specially the ATHENIANS, to whom he did many great pleasures. Wherefore the MEGARIANS, to exceede the ATHENIANS, thinking to shew Antonius a goodly sight: they prayed him to come & see their Senate house, & counsell hall. Antonius went thither to see it: so when he had seene it at his pleasure, they asked him, my Lord, how like you our hall? Me thinkes (q he) it is litle, old, and ready to fall downe. Furthermore, he tooke measure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promised the Senate to finish it. But when he was once come into ASIA, hauing left Lucius Censorinus Gouvernor in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleasures of the East partes, and that Princes, great Lordes and Kinges, came to waite at his gate for his coming out, and that Queenes and *Princesse*s to excell one an other, gaue him verie riche presentes, and came to see him, curiously setting forth them selues, and vsing all art that might be to shewe their beawtie, to win his fauor the more: (Cæsar in the meane space turmoyling his wits and bodie in ciuill warres at home, Antonius liuing merrily & quietly abroad) he easely fell againe to his old licentious life. For straight one Anaxenor a player of the citherne, Xouthus a player of the flutes, Metrodorus a tombler, and such a rabble of minstrells & fit ministers for the pleasures of ASIA, (who in finenes & flattery passed all the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALIE) all these flocked in his court, & bare the whole sway: & after that, all went awry. For euery one gaue them selues to riot and exceste, when they saw he delighted in it: and all ASIA was like to the citie Sophocles speaketh of in one of his tragedies:

*VVas full of sweete perfumes, and pleasant songs,

For in the citie of EPHESVS, women attyed as they goe in the feastes and sacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meete him with such solemnities & ceremonies, as are then vsed: with men and children disguised like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreover, the citie was full of luey, & darts wreathed about with luey, psalterions, flutes and howboyes, and in their songes they called him Bacchus, father of mirth, courteous, and gentle: and so was he vnto some, but to the most parte of men, cruell, and extreame. For he robbed noble men and gentle men of their goods, to geue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged mens goods liuing, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houses by force. As he gaue a citizens house of MAGNESTA vnto a cooke, bicause (as it is reported) he dressed him a fine supper. In the ende he doubled the taxation, and imposed a seconde vpon ASIA. But then Hybraas the Orator sent from the estates of ASIA, to tell him the state of their contrie, boldly sayd vnto him: if thou wilt haue power to lay two tributes in one yere vpon vs, thou shouldest also haue power to geue vs two sommers, two autumnes, and two haruests. This was gallantly and pleasantly spoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleased him well to heare it: but afterwards amplifying his speache, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose. ASIA hath payed the two hundred thousand talents. If all this money be not come to thy cofers, then aske accompt of them that leaued it: but if thou haue receiued it, and nothing be left of it, then are we vterly vndone. Hybraas words nettled Antonius roundly. For he vnderstoode not many of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authoritie, in his treasure and affaires: nor so much bicause he was carelesse, as for that he ouersimply trusted his men in all things. For he was a plaine man, without furtletie, and therefore ouerlate founde out the fowle fautes they committed against him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confesse it vnto them whome his officers had done iniurie vnto, by countenance of his authoritie. He had a noble minde, as well to punish offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet

As he did exceede more in geuing, then in punishing. Now for his outrageous manner of railing he commonly vsed, mocking and flouting of euery man: that was remedied by it selfe. For a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, & he was as well contented to be mocked, as to mock others. But yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that those which told him so plainly, & truly in mirth: would neuer flatter him in good earnest, in any matter of weight. But thus he was easely abused by the praises they gaue him, not finding how these flatterers mingled their flatterie, vnder this familiar and plaine manner of speech vnto him, as a fine deuise to make difference of meares with sharpe and tart sauce, & also to kepe him by this franke iealeting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie should not be troublesome vnto him, as men do easely mislike to haue too much of one thing: and that they handled him finely thereby, when they would geue him place in any matter of weight, and follow his counsell, that it might not appeare to him they did it so much to please him, but bicause they were ignorant, & vnderstoode not so much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the last and extreamest mischiefe of all other (to wit, the loue of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and stirre vp many vices yet hidden in him, and were neuer seene to any: and if any sparke of goodnesse or hope of riing were left him, Cleopatra quenched it straight, and made it worse then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make warre with the PARTHIANS, sent to commaunde Cleopatra to appeare personally before him, when he came into CILICIA, to aunswere vnto suche accusations as were layed against her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their warre against him. The messenger sent vnto Cleopatra to make this summons vnto her, was called Dellius: who when he had thoroughly considered her beawtie, the excellent grace and sweetenesse of her tongue, he nothing mistrusted that Antonius would doe any hurte to so noble a Ladie, but rather assured him selfe, that within few dayes she should be in great fauor with him. Thereupon he did her great honor, and perswaded her to come into CILICIA, as honorably furnished as she could possiblie, and bad her not to be affrayed at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that she had euer seene. Cleopatra on thother side beleuing Dellius wordes, and gessing by the former access and credit she had with Julius Cæsar, and Cneus Pompey (the sonne of Pompey the great) only for her beawtie: she began to haue good hope that she might more easely win Antonius. For Cæsar and Pompey knew her when she was but a young thing, & knew not then what the worlde ment: but nowe she went to Antonius at the age when a womans beawtie is at the prime, and the also of best iudgement. So, she furnished her selfe with a world of gifts, store of gold and siluer, and of riches and other sumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough she might bring from so great a house, and from so wealthie and rich a realme as EGYPT was. But yet she caried nothing with her wherein she trusted more then in her selfe, and in the charmes and inchantment of her passing beawtie and grace. Therefore when she was sent vnto by diuers letters, both from Antonius him selfe, and also from his frendes, she made so light of it, and mocked Antonius so much, that she diddaind to set forward otherwise, but to take her barge in the riuer of Cydnus, the poope whereof was of gold, the sailes of purple, and the owers of siluer, which kept stroke in rowing after the founde of the musicke of flutes, & howboyes, citherns, violls, and such other instruments as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the person of her selfe: she was layed vnder a pavillion of cloth of gold of tiffue, apparelled and attired like the goddesse Venus, commonly drawn in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as painters doe set forth god Cupid, with litle fannes in their hands, with the which they fanned wind vpon her. Her Ladies and gentlewomen also, the fairest of them were apparelled like the nymphes Nereides (which are the mermaides of the waters) and like the Graces, some stearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull passing sweete fauor of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes side, pelttered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all alongest the riuers side: others also ranne out of the citie to see her coming in. So that in thend, there ranne such multitudes of people one after another to see her, that Antonius was left post alone in the market place, in his Imperiall seate to geue audience: and there went a rumor in the peoples mouthes, that the goddesse Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus, for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius sent to inuite her to supper to him. But the fent him word againe, he should doe better rather to come and suppe with her. Antonius therefore to shew him selfe courteous vnto her at her arriuall, was contented to obey her, & went to supper to her: where he found such passing sumptuous fare, that no tongue can expresse it. But amongst all other things, he most wondered at the infinite number of lightes and torches hanged on the toppes of the house, geuing light in euerie place, so artificially set and ordered by deuises, some round, some square: that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discerne, or that euer books could mention. The next night, Antonius feasting her, contended to passe her in magnificence and finenes: but the ouercame him in both. So that he him selfe began to skorne the grosse seruice of his house, in respect of Cleopatras sumptuousnes and finenesse. And when Cleopatra found Antonius icasts and flents to be but grosse, and soldierlike, in plaine manner: the gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him thoroughly. Now her beawtie (as it is reported) was not so passing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet fuche, as vpon present viewe did enamour men with her: but so sweete was her companie and conuersation, that a man could not possiblie but be taken. And besides her beawtie, the good grace she had to talke and discourse, her courteous nature that tempered her words & dedes, was a spurre that pricked to the quick. Furthermore, besides all these, her voyce and words were maruelous pleasant: for her tongue was an instrument of musike to diuers sports and pastimes, the which she easely turned to any language that pleased her. She spake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter, but made them auniuer her selfe, or at the least the most parte of them: as the *Æthiopi*ans, the A-C-*R*ABIANs, the *T*ROGLDYTES, the *H*EBREVS, the *S*YRIANs, the *M*EDES, and the *P*ARTHIANs, and to many others also, whose languages she had learned. Whereas diuers of her progenitors, the kings of Ægypt, could scarce learne the Ægyptian tongue only, and many of them forgot to speake the MACEDONIAN. Nowe, Antonius was so rauished with the loue of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fulvia had great warres, and much a doe with Cesar for his affaires, and that the armie of the *P*ARTHIANs, (the which the kings Licentiautes had geuen to the onely leading of Labiens) was now assembled in *M*ESOPOTAMIA readie to inuade *S*YRIA: yet, as though all this had nothing touched him, he yeelded him selfe to goe with Cleopatra into *A*LEXANDRIA, where he spent and lost in childish sports, (as a man might say) and idle pastimes, the most pretious thing a man can spende, as Antiphon sayth: and that is, time. For they made an order betwene them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to say, no life comparable and matcheable with it) one feasting ech other by turnes, and in cost, exceeding all measure and reason. And for prooffe hereof, I haue heard my grandfather Lamprys report, that one Philotas a Phisitien, borne in the cite of *A*MPHISIA, told him that he was at that present time in *A*LEXANDRIA, and studied Phisicke: and that hauing acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius house, (being a young man desirous to see things) to shew him the wonderfull sumptuous charge and preparation of one onely supper. When he was in the kitchen, and saw a world of diuersities of meates, and amongst others, eight wilde boares roasted whole: he began to wonder at it, and sayd, sure you haue a great number of ghests to supper. The cooke fell a laughing, and answered him, no (he) not many ghestes, nor aboute twelue in all: but yet all that is boyled or roasted must be serued in whole, or else it would be marred straight. For Antonius peradventure will suppe presently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath dronke well to day, or else hath had some other great matters in hand: and therefore we doe not dresse one supper only, but many suppers, because we are uncerteine of the houre he will suppe in. Philotas the Phisitien tolde my grandfather this tale, and sayd moreover, that it was his chauce shortly after to serue the eldest sonne of the sayd Antonius, whome he had by his wife Fulvia: and that he fate commonly at his table with his other frendes, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chaunced one day there came a Phisitien that was so full of words, that he made euery man wearie of him at the bord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put out a subtle proposition to him. It is good in some sorte to let a man drinke colde water that hath an agew: euerie man that hath an agew hath it in some sorte, ergo it is good for a man

A man that hath an agew to drinke colde water. The Phisitien was so grauelled and amazed with all, that he had not a word more to say. Young Antonius burst out in such a laughing as him, and was so glad of it, that he sayd vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I geue it thee: shewing him his cubbord full of plate, with great pots of gold and siluer. Philotas thanked him, and told him he thought himselfe greatly bound to him for this liberality, but he would neuer haue thought that he had had power to haue geuen so many things, and of so great value. But much more he marvelled, when shortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him ser his marke and stampe vpon them, and to locke them vp. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reprocued if he tooke them. Then the youg gentleman Antonius sayd vnto him: alas poore man, why doest thou make it nife to take them? Knowest thou not that it is the sonne of Antonius that geues them thee, and is able to do it? If thou wilt not beleue me, take rather the readie money they come to: because my father peradventure may aske for some of the plate, for the antike & excellent workmanship of them. This I haue heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato writeth that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuied it into many kinds. For shee, were it in sport, or in matter of earnest, still deuised fundrie new delights to haue Antonius at commandement, neuer leauing him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her sight. For she would play at dyce with him, drinke with him, and hunt commonly with him, and also be with him when he went to any exercise or actiuitie of body. And sometime also, when he would goe vp and downe the citie disguised like a slaue in the night, & would peere into poore mens windowes & their shops, and scold & brawle with them within the house: Cleopatra would be also in a chamber maides array, & amble vp & downe the streets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mockes & blowes. Now, though most men misliked this manner, yet the *A*LEXANDRIANs were commonly glad of this idoly, & liked it well, saying verie gallantly, and wisely: that Antonius shewed them a comicall face, to wit, a merie countenance: and the *R*OMANs a tragical face, to say, a grimme looke. But to reckon vp all the foolish sportes they made, reuelling in this sorte: it were too fond a parte of me, and therefore I will only tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take none, he was as angrie as could be, because Cleopatra stood by. Wherefore he secretly commanded the fisher men, that when he cast in his line, they should straight diue vnder the water, and put a fish on his hooke which they had taken before: and so snatched vp his angling rodde, and brought vp fish twife or thrife. Cleopatra found it straight, yet the seemed not to see it, but wondered at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her owne people, she told them howe it was, and bad them the next morning to be on the water to see the fishing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fisher boates to see this fishing. Antonius then threw in his line and Cleopatra straight commaunded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, and to put some old fatte fish vpon his baite, like vnto those that are brought out of the contrie of *P*ONT. When he had hong the fish on his hooke, Antonius thinking he had taken a fish in deede, snatched vp his line presently. Then they all fell a laughing, Cleopatra laughing also, said vnto him: leaue vs (my Lord) Ægyptians (which dwell in the contrie of *P*HARVS and *C*ANOBVS) your angling rodde: this is not thy profession: thou must hunt after conquering of realmes and contries. Nowe Antonius delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, verie ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from *R*OME, that his brother Lucius, and Fulvia his wife, fell out first betwene them selues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cesar, & had brought all to nought, that they were both driven forth out of *I*TALIE. The seconde newes, as bad as the first: that Labiennus conquered all *A*RIA with the armie of the *P*ARTHIANs, from the riuer of *E*uphrates, and from *S*YRIA vnto the contries of *L*YDIA and *I*ONIA. Then began Antonius with much a doe, a litle to rouse him selfe as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe sleepe, and as a man may say, comming out of a great dronkenness. So, first of all he bent him selfe against the *P*ARTHIANs, and went as far as the contrie of *P*HONICIA: but there he receiued lamentable letters from his wife Fulvia. Whereuppon he straight returned towards *I*TALIE, with two hundred faile: and as he went, tooke vp his frendes by the way that fled out of *I*TALIE, to come to him. By the time he was in

The death of Fulvia Antonius wife.

All the Empire of Rome decided betwene the Triumvirs, Octavia, the halfe sister of Antonius Caesar, & daughter of Anchura, who was the first procuress of this warre, fearing to make matters worse betwene them: but they made them friends together, and deuided the Empire of Rome betwene them, making the sea Ionium the bounds of their diuision. For they gaue all the prouinces Eastward, vnto Antonius: and the countie Westward, vnto Caesar: and left AFRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a law, that they three one after another should make their friends Consuls, when they would not be them selues. This seemed to be a sound counsell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter bonde, which fortune offered thus. There was Octavia the eldest sister of Caesar, not by one mother, for she came of Anchura, & Caesar him self afterwards of Ascia. It is reported, that he dearly loued his sister Octavia, for in deede she was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her first husband Caius Marcellus, who dyed not long before: and it seemed also that Antonius had bene widower euen since the death of his wife Fulvia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, but so did he not confesse that he had her as his wife: & so with reason he did defend the loue he bare vnto this EGYPTIAN Cleopatra. Thereupon euerie man did set forward this marriage, hoping thereby that this Ladie Octavia, hauing an excellent grace, wisdom, & honestie, ioynd vnto so rare a beawtie, that when she were with Antonius (he louing her as so worthy a Ladie deserueth) she should be a good meane to keepe good loue & amitie betwix her brother and him. So when Caesar & he had made the matche betwene them, they both went to Rome about this marriage, although it was against the law, that a widow should be married within tenne monethes after her husbandes death. Howbeit the Senate dispensed with the law, and so the marriage proceeded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in SICILIA, and so made many an inrode into ITALIA with a great number of pygnasses and other pirates shippes, of the which were Capitaines two notable pirats, Menas, and Menebrates, who so scoored all the sea thereabouts, that none durst peepe out with a sayle. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had delt verie friendly with Antonius, for he had courteously receiued his mother, when she fled out of ITALIA with Fulvia: and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of Milena, vpon a hill that runneth farre into the sea: Pompey hauing his shippes ryding hard by at anker, and Antonius and Caesar their armies vpon the shoare side, did rectly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should haue SICILIA and SARDINIA, with this condicon, that he should ridde the sea of all theeues and pirats, and make it safe for passengers, and withall that he should send a certaine of wheate to Rome: some of them did feast an other, and drew cuts who should beginne. It was Pompeius chaunce to winne them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: & where shall we suppe? There, said Pompey, and shewed him his admirall galley which had six bankes of owers: that (sayd he) is my fathers house: they haue left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, because he had his fathers house, that was Pompeys the great. So he cast ankers enow into the sea, to make his galley fast, and then bulled bridge of woodde to conuey them to his galley, from the heade of mount Milena: and there he welcomed them, and made them great chere. Now in the midst of the feast, when they fell to be merie with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra: Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whispering in his eare, said vnto him: shall I cut the gables of the ankers, and make thee Lord not only of SICILIE and SARDINIA, but of the whole Empire of Rome besides? Pompey being puffed with a while vpon it, at length answered him: thou shouldest haue done it, and neuer haue told it me, but now we must content vs with that we haue. As for my selfe, I was neuer taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two also did likewise feare him in their campe, and then he returned into SICILIE. Antonius after this agreement made, sent Ventidius before into ASIA to stay the PARTHIANS, and to keepe them they should come no further: and he him selfe in the meane time, to gratifie Caesar, was contented to be chosen Iulius Caesars priest and sacrificer, & so they ioyntly together dispatched all great matters, concerning the state of the Empire. But in all other manner of sports and exercises, wherein they passed the time away the one with the other: Antonius was euer inferior vnto Caesar, and alway lost, which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a soothsayer or astronomer of EGYPT, that coulde cast a figure, and iudge of mens natiuities, to tell them what should happen to them. He, either to please Cleopatra, or else for that he founde it so by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it selfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether bleamished, and obfcured by Caesars fortune: and therefore he counselled him vterly to leaue his company, and to get him as farre from him as he could. For thy Demon said he, (that is to say, the good angell and spirit that kepeth thee) is affraid of his: and being coragious & high when he is alone, becometh fearefull and timorous when he commeth neere vnto the other. Howsoeuer it was, the euents ensuing proued the EGYPTIANs words true. For, it is said, that as often as they two drew cuts for pastime, who should haue any thing, or whether they played at dice, Antonius alway lost. Oftentimes when they were disposed to see cockefight, or quails that were taught to fight one with an other: Caesars cockes or quails did euer ouercome. The which spight Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward shew of it: and therefore he beleued the EGYPTIAN the better. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his house vnto Caesar, & went out of ITALIA with Octavia his wife, whom he caried into GRECE, after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the winter at ATHENS, newes came vnto him of the victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the PARTHIANS in battell, in the which also were slaine, Labienus, and Pharnabates, the chiefe Captaine king Orodes had. For these good newes he feasted all ATHENS, and kept open house for all the GRECIANS, and many games of price were played at ATHENS, of the which he him selfe would be iudge. Wherefor leauing his gard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his house, he came into the how place (or lites) where these games were played, in a long gowne and slippers after the GRECIAN facion, and they caried tipstauas before him, as marshalls men do cary before the Iudges to make place: and he him selfe in person was a stickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the warres, he made him a garland of the holy Oliue, and caried a vessell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepsidra, because of an Oracle he had receiued that so commaunded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus, (Orodes sonne king of PARTHIA) in a battell fought in the contrie of CYRESTICA, he being come againe with a great armie to inuade SYRIA: at which battell was slaine a great number of the PARTHIANS, & among them Pacorus, the kings owne sonne slaine. This noble exploit as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the ROMANES, of the shame and losse they had receiued before by the death of Marcus Crassus: and he made the PARTHIANS flie, and glad to keepe them selues within the confines and territories of MESOPOTAMIA, and MEDIA, after they had thrife together bene ouercome in seuerall battells. Howbeit Ventidius durst not vndertake to follow them any further, fearing least he should haue gotten Antonius displeasure by it. Notwithstanding, he led his armie against them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongst whom he besieged Antiochus, king of COMMAGENA, who offered him to give a thousand talentes to be pardoned his rebellion, and promised euer after to be at Antonius commaundement. But Ventidius made him answer, that he should send vnto Antonius, who was not farre off, and would not suffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exploit should passe in his name, and that they should not thinke he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Antiochus. The siege grew verie long, because they that were in the towne, seeing they coulde not be receiued vpon no reasonable composition: determined valiantly to defende them selues to the last man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great shame, repenting him much that he tooke not their first offer. And yet at last he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talentes for composition. Thus after he had set order for the state & affaires of SYRIA, he returned againe to ATHENS: and hauing giuen Ventidius suche honors as he deserved, he sent him to Rome, to triumphe for the PARTHIANS. Ventidius was the only man that euer triumphed of the PARTHIANS vnto ill this present day, a meane man borne, and of no noble house nor family: who only came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius friendshipp, the which deliuered him happie occasion to achieve to great matters. And yet to say truly, he did so well quit him selfe in all his enterprises, that he confirmed that which was spoken of Antonius and Cesar: to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by their selues. For Sosius, one of Antonius Lieutenantes in SYRIA, did notable good seruice: and Candianus, whom he had also left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he also ouercome the kinges of the IBERIANS and ALBANIANs, and went on with his conquests vnto mount Caucasus. By these conquests, the fame of Antonius power increased more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithstanding, grew to be maruelously offended with Cesar, vpon certaine reportes that had bene brought vnto him: and so tooke lea to go towards ITALIE with three hundred faile. And because those of BRYNDYSIUM would not receiue his armie into their haven, he went further vnto TARENTUM. There his wife Octavia that came out of GRECE with him, befought him to fend her vnto her brother: the which he did. Octavia at that time was great with child, and moreover had a second daughter by him, and yet she put her selfe in iorney, and met with her brother Octavius Caesar by the way, who brought his two chiefe frendes, Mecenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aside, and with all the instance she could possiblie, intreated them they would not suffer her that was the happiest woman of the world, to become nowe the most wretched and vnfortunatest creature of all other. For now, said she, euerie mans eyes doe gaze on me, that am the sister of one of the Emperours and wife of the other. And if the worst counsell take place, (which the goddes forbidde) and that they growe to warres: for your selues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the goddes haue assigned the victorie, or overthrowe. But for me, on which side fouer victorie fall, my fite can be but most miserable fill. These words of Octavia so softened Cesars harte, that he went quickly vnto TARENTUM. But it was a noble fight for them that were present, to see so great an armie by lande not to stirre, and so many shippes ashore in the roade, quietly and safe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindnesse of frendes, Iouling embracing one an other. First, Antonius sealed Cesar, which he granted vnto for his sisters sake. Afterwardes they agreed together, that Cesar should geue Antonius two legions to go against the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius should let Cesar haue a hundred gallies armed with brasse spures at the prooes. Besides all this, Octavia obteyned of her husbande, twentie brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her husbande, a thousande armed men. After they had taken leaue of each other, Cesar went immediately to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to gette SICILIA into his handes. Antonius also leauing his wife Octavia and litle children begotten of her, with Cesar, and his other children which he had by Fulvia: he went directlie into ASIA. Then beganne this pestilent plague and mischief of Cleopatras loue (which had slept a long tyme, and seemed to haue bene vterlie forgotten, and that Antonius had geuen place to better counsell) againe to kindle, and to be in force, so soone as Antonius came neere vnto SYRIA. And in the ende, the horse of the minde as Plato termeth it, that is so hard of rayne (I meane the vneyreid lust of concupiscence) did put out of Antonius heade, all honest and commendable thoughtes: for he sent Pontellus Capito to bring Cleopatra into SYRIA. Vnto whome, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things: but vnto that he had already, he added the prouinces of PHOENICIA, those of the nethermost SYRIA, the Ile of CYPRVS, and a great parte of CILICIA, and that contrie of LYBIE where the true balme is, and that parte of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS doe dwell, which stretcheth out towards the Ocean. These great giftes muche misliked the ROMANES. But now, though Antonius did easily geue away great feignories, realmes, & mighty nations vnto some priuate men, and that also he tooke from other kings their lawfull realmes (as from Antigonius king of the IAWRS, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had suffred like death) yet all this did not so much offend the ROMANES, as the vnumeasurabie honors which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauate their malice & it wil be towards him, because that Cleopatra hauing brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter, he named his sonne Alexander, & his daughter Cleopatra, and gaue them to their surnames, the

A Same to the one, & the moone to the other. This notwithstanding, he that could finely cloke his shamefull deedes with fine words, said that the greatnes & magnificence of the Empire of ROMA appeared most, not where the ROMANES tooke, but where they gaue much: & nobility was multiplied amongst men, by the posterity of kings, when they left of their seede in diuers places: and that by this meanes his first auncclester was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and posterity, in the wombe of one only woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinaunces of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gaue it vnto nature, and established the fundacion of many noble races and families in diuers places. Nowe when Phraortes had slaine his father Orades, and possessed the kingdom of many gentlemen of PARTHIA forooke him, and fled from him. Amongst them was Manages, a noble man, and of great authority among his contry men, who came vnto Antonius, that receiued him, & compared his fortune vnto Themistocles, and his owne riches & magnificence, vnto the kings of PERSIA. For he gaue Manages three cities, LARISSA, AETHYSSA, & HIRAPOLIS, which was called before BOMBYCE. Howbeit the king of PARTHIA shortly after called him home againe, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to steale vpon Phraortes vnprovidd. For he sent vnto him, & told him that they would remaine good frends, & haue peace together, so he would but only redeliuer the standers & ensignes of the ROMANES, which the PARTHIANS had wonne in the battell where Marcus Crassus was slaine, & the men also that remained yet prisoners of this ouerthrow. In the meane time he sent Cleopatra backe into EGYPT, & tooke his way towards ARABIA & ARMENIA, & there tooke a general muster of all his army he had together, & of the kings his cōfederats that were come by his cōmāndement to aide him, being a maruelous number: of the which, the chieftest was Artaxasdes, king of ARMENIA, who did furnish him with six thousande horsemen, and seuen thousand footemen. There were also of the ROMANES about three score thousand footmen, & of horsemen (SPANIARDS & GAYLES reckoned for ROMANES) to the number of ten thousand, & of other nations thirty thousand men, reckoning together the horsemen and light armed footmen. This so great & puissant army which made the INDIANS quake for feare, dwelling about the contrie of the BACTRIANS, and all ASIA also to tremble, serued him to no purpose, & all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra. For the earnest great desire he had to lye all winter with her, made him begin his warre out of due time, and for hast, to put all in hazard, being so rauished & enchanted with the sweete poyson of her loue, that he had no other thought but of her, & how he might quickly returne againe: more then how he might ouercome his enemies. For first of all, where he should haue wintered in ARMENIA to refresh his men, wearied with the long iorney they had made, hauing comen eight thousand furlongs, and then at the beginning of the spring to go and inuade MEDIA, before the PARTHIANS should stirre out of their houses & garriisons: he could tary no longer, but led them forth with vnto the prouince of ATROPATENE, leauing ARMENIA on the left hand, & foraged all the contrie. Furthermore, making all the hast he coule, he left behinde him engines of batterry which were caried with him in three hundred carts, (among the which also there was a ramme foure score foote long) being things most necessary for him, and the which he could not get againe for money if they were once lost or marred. For the hie prouince ASIA haue no trees growing of such height and length, neither strong nor straight enough to make such like engines of batterry. This notwithstanding, he left them all behinde him, as a hinderance to bring his matters & intent speedily to passe: and left a certaine number of men to keepe them, and gaue them in charge vnto one Tatianus. Then he went to besiege the cite of PHRAATA, being the chieftest and greatest cite the king of MEDIA had, where his wife and children were. Then he straight sounde his owne fault, and the want of his artillerie he left behinde him, by the worke he had in hand: for he was fayne for lacke of a breache (where his men might come to the sword with their enemies that defended the walle) to force a mount of earth hard to the walles of the cite, the which by litle and litle with greate labour, rose to some height. In the meane time king Phraortes came downe with a great armie: who vnderstanding that Antonius had left his engines of batterie behinde him, he sent a great number of horsemen before, which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage, and slue him, and ten thousand men he had with him. the barbarous people tooke their engines of battery and burnt them, and got many prisoners, A amongst whom they tooke also king Polemon. This discomfort marvellously troubled all Antonius army, to recieve so great an overthrow (beyond their expectation) at the beginning of their iorney: in so much that Artabazus, king of the ARMENIANS, despairing of the good success of the ROMANS: departed with his men, notwithstanding that he was him selfe the first procurer of this warre and iorney. On the other side, the *PARTHIAN*s came courageously vnto Antonius campe, who lay at the siege of their chiefe city, and cruelly reuiled and threatened him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens hearts would faile them: he tooke ten legions, with three cohorts or ensignes of the Prætors, (which are companies appointed for the gard of the Generall) and all his horsemen, and caried them out to forrage, hoping thereby he should easily allure the *PARTHIAN*s to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a dayes iorney from his campe, he saw the *PARTHIAN*s wheeling round about him to geue him the onfet, & to skirmish with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he set out his signall of battell, & yet caused his tents and fardells to be trusted vp, as though he ment not to fight, but only to lead his men back againe. Then he marched before the army of the barbarous people, the which was marshalled like a cressant or halfe moone: and commaunded his horsemen, that as soone as they thought the legions were nere enough vnto their enemies to set vpon the voward, that then they should set spurres to their horses, & begin the charge. The *PARTHIAN*s standing in battell ray, beholding the countenance of the ROMANS as they marched: they appeared to be fouldiers in deede, to see them marche in so good array as was possible. For in their march, they kept the ranks a like space one from another, not straggling out of order, and shaking their pikes, speaking neuer a word. But so soone as the allarom was giuen, the horsemen sodainly turned head vpon the *PARTHIAN*s, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the first recieued their charge courageously, for they were ioined nerer the within an arrowes shoote. But when the legions also came to ioine with them, shewing out alowde, & rattling of their armors: the *PARTHIAN*s horses and them selues were so affrayed and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMANS could come to the sword with them. Then Antonius followed the hard in chase, being in great good hope by this conflict to haue brought to end all, or the most part of this warre. But after that his footemen had chased them fiftie furlonges of, and the horsemen also thrise as farre: they found in all but thirty prisoners taken, and about foure score men only slaine. But this did much discourage them, when they considered with them selues, that obtaining the victory, they had slaine so few of their enemies: and where they were overcome, they lost as many of their men, as they had done at the overthrow when the cariage was taken. The next morning, Antonius army trusted vp their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the first a few of the *PARTHIAN*s: then going further, they met a few moe. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, & troubled them on euery side, as freshly & courageously, as if they had not bene overthrown: so that the ROMANS very hardly got to their campe with safety. The MEDES on the other side, that were besieged in their chiefe city of PHRAATA, made a sally out vpon them that kept the mount, which they had forced and cast against the wall of the city, and draue them for feare, from the mount they kept. Antonius was so offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he deuicid his men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fell: and to the other nine, he caused them to haue barley giuen them in stead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out trouble some vnto both parties, and the ende thereof much more fearefull. For Antonius could looke for no other of his side, but famine: because he could forrage no more, nor fetch in any vittells, without great losse of his men. Phaortes on the other side, he knew well enough that he could bring the *PARTHIAN*s to any thing els, but to lye in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was affrayed, that if the ROMANS continued their siege all winter long, & made warre with him still that his me would forsake him, & specially because the time of the yere went away apace, & the ayer waxed cloudy, & cold, in the equinoctiall autumn. Therupon he called to mind this deuise. He gaue the chiefe of his gentlem of the *PARTHIAN*s charge, that when they met the ROMANS out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their their horse, or for some other prouision: that they should not distresse them too much, but should suffer them to carie somewhat away, and greatly commend their valliantnes and hardines, for the which their king did esteeme them the more, and not without cause. After these first baytes and allurements, they beganne by litle and litle to come neerer vnto them; and to talke with them a horsebacke, greatly blaming Antonius selfewill that did not geue their king Phaortes occasion to make a good peace, who desired nothing more, then to saue the liues of so goodly a companie of valliant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greatest and most dreadfull enemies he could haue, to wit: winter, and famine, the which they should hardly away withall, though the *PARTHIAN*s did the best they could to aide & accompany them. These words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle pliant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not sende vnto the king of PARTHIA, before they had first asked these barbarous people that spake so courteously vnto his men, whether they spake it of them selues, or that they were their maisters words. When they told them the king him selfe sayd so, and did perswade them further not to feare or mistrust them: then Antonius sent some of his friends vnto the king, to make demaund for the deliuey of the ensignes and prisoners he had of the ROMANS, since the overthrow of Cyrtus: to the ende it should not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they shoulde thinke he was glad that he might only scape with safety out of the daunger he was in. The king of PARTHIA answered him: that for the ensignes & prisoners he demaunded, he should not breake his head about it: notwithstanding, that if he would presently depart without delay, he might depart in peaceable manner, and without daunger. Wherefore Antonius after he had giuen his men some time to truste vp their cariage, he raised his campe, & tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very gallant to enterteine his fouldiers and men of warre, and that he could passingly well do it, as well, or better then any Capitaine in his time: yet being ashamed for respects, he would not speake vnto them at his removing, but willed Domitius AEnobarbus to do it. Many of them tooke this in very ill parte, & thought that he did it in disdain of them: but the most part of them presently vnderstoode the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therefore they thought it their duties to carie the like respect vnto their Capitaine, that their Capitaine did vnto them: and so they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the same way he came, being a plaine barren contry without wodde. But there came a fouldier to him, borne in the contry of the *MARDIAN*s, who by oft frequenting the *PARTHIAN*s of long time, knew their facions very wel, and had also shewed him selfe very true & faithfull to the ROMANS, in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counsell him to beware how he went that way, and to make his army a pray, being heauily armed, vnto so great a number of horsemen, all archers in the open field, where they should haue nothing to let them to compass him round about: and that this was Phaortes fetch to offer him so friendly codicions & courteous words to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meete him as he would, in the plaines: howbeit, that he would guide him, if he thought good, an other way on the right hand, through woddess & mountaines, a farre neerer way, and where he should finde great plenty of all things needefull for his army. Antonius hearing what he said, called his counsell together, to consult vpon it. For after he had made peace with the *PARTHIAN*s, he was loth to geue them cause to thinke he mistrusted them: and on thother side also he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places well inhabited, where he might be prouided of all things necessary: therefore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promised. The MARDIAN gaue himselfe to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the contry of ARMENIA. So he guided the army thus bound, two dayes together, without any trouble or sight of enemy. But the third day, Antonius thinking the *PARTHIAN*s would no more follow him, & trusting therein, suffred the fouldiers to march in disorder as euery man list. The MARDIAN perceiving that the dammes of a riuer were newly broken vp, which they should haue passed ouer, & that the *F*riuer had overflowen the banks and drowned all the way they shoulde haue gone: he gessed fraight that the *PARTHIAN*s had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMANS for getting too farre before them. Therupon he bad Antonius looke to him selfe, and told him that his enemies were not farre from thence. Antonius hauing set his men in order, as he was placing of his archers & sling men to resist the enemies, & to driue them backe: they discomfited the *PARTHIAN*s that wheeled round about the army to compasse them in on euery side, & to breake their ranks, & their light armed men gaue charge vpon them. So after they had hurt many of the *ROMAN*es with their arrowes, and that they them selues were also hurt by them with their darters and plummets of leade: they retired a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge. Vntill that the horsemen of the *GAULE*s turned their horses, & fiercely galloped towards them, that they dispersed them so, as al that day they gathered no more together. Thereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only strengthen the reward of his army, but both the flanks also, with darters and sling men, and made his army march in a square battell: commanding the horsemen, that when the enemies should come to assaile them, they shoulde driue them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the *PARTHIAN*s foure daies after, seeing they did no more hurte to the *ROMAN*es, then they also receiued of them: they were not so hotte vpon them as they were commanded, but excusing them selues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fift day, Flavius Gallus, a valliant man of his handes, that had charge in the armie: came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him haue some moe of his light armed men then were already in the reuerward, and some of the horsemen that were in the voward, hoping thereby to doe some notable exploit. Antonius granting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their maner to set vpon the taile of the army, and to skirmish with them: Flavius coragiously made them retire, but not as they were wont to doe before, to retire and ioyne presently with their army, for he ouerashly thrust in among them to fight it out at the sword. The Capteines that had the leading of the reuerward, seeing Flavius stray too farre from the army: they sent vnto him to will him to retire, but he would not harken to it. And it is reported also, that Titius himselfe the Treasorer, tooke the ensignes, & did what he could to make the ensigne bearers returne backe, reuiling Flavius Gallus, because that through his folly and desperantes he caused many honest and valliant men to be both hurt & laine to no purpose. Gallus also fel out with him, and commaunded his men to stay. Wherefore Titius returned againe into the army, and Gallus stil ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies backe whom he met in the voward, he was not ware that he was compassed in. Then seeing him selfe environned of all sides, he sent vnto the army, that they shoulde come and aide him: but there the Capteines that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great estimation about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they shoulde haue made head with the whole army vpon the *PARTHIAN*s, they sent him aide by small companies: and when they were slaine, they sent him others also. So that by their beastlineesse and lacke of consideration, they had like to haue made all the armie flie, if Antonius him selfe had not come fro the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the midst of them that fled, vntill they came to front of the enemies, & that they stayed them from chafing any further. Howbeit at this last consist there were slaine no lesse the three thousand men, and fise thousande besides brought fore hurt into the campe, and amongst them also Flavius Gallus, whose body was shot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the tents to visite & comfort the sicke & wounded, and for pities sake he could not refrain from weeping: and they also shewing him the best countenance they coulede, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dressed, and not to trouble him selfe for them, most reuerently calling him their Emperour & Capitaine: & that for them selues, they were whole & safe, so that he had his health. For in deede to say truly, there was not at that time any Emperour or Capitaine that had so great & puissant an army as his together, both for lusty youths, & corage of the souldiers, as also for their patience to away with so great paines & trouble. Furthermore, the obedience & reuerence they shewed vnto their capitaine, with a marvelous earnest loue & good wil, was so great: & all were indifferently (as wel great as smal, the noble men, as meane men, the Capteines and souldiers) so earnestly bent to esteeme Antonius good will & fauor, about their owne life & safety: that in this point of marshall discipline, the ancient *ROMAN*es could not haue don any more. But diuers things were cause therof, as we haue told you before: Antonius nobility & ancient house, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality & magnificence,

The bold act of Flavius Gallus.

Canidius faults, Antonius Capitaine.

Flavius Gallus slaine. Antonius care of them that were wounded.

The loue and reuerence of the souldiers vnto Antonius.

There are singular gifts of Antonius.

A magnificence, & his familiarity to sport & to be mery in company: but specially the care he tooke at that time to help, visite, & lament those that were sicke & wounded, leing euery man to haue that which was meete for him: that was of such force & effect, as it made them that were sicke & wounded to loue him better, & were more desirous to do him seruice, then those that were whole & sound. This victory so encouraged the enemies, (who otherwise were weary to follow Antonius any further) that all night longe they kept the fieldes, and hovered about the *ROMAN*es campe, thinking that they would presently flie, & then that they shoulde take the spoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of daye, there were gathered together a farre greater nuber of the *PARTHIAN*s, then they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then forty thousand horse, because their king sent thither euen the very gard about his person, as vnto a most certaine and assured victory, that they might be partners of the spoyle and booty they hoped to haue had: for as touching the king him selfe, he was neuer in any conflict or battell. Then Antonius desirous to speake to his souldiers, called for a blacke gowne, to appeare the more pitifull to them: but his friends did disswade him from it. Therefore he put on his coate armor, and being so apparelled, made an oration to his armie in the which he highly commended them that had ouercome and driuen backe their enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backs. So that those which had ouercome, prayed him to be of good chere: the other also to cleere them selues, willingly offered to take the lots of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwise, to receive what kind of punishment it shoulde please him to laye vpon them, so that he would forget any more to milke, or to be offended with them. Antonius seeing that, did lift vp his hands to heauen, and made his prayer to the goddes, that if in exchange of his former victories, they would now sende him some bitter aduerlittie: then that all might light on him selfe alone, and that they would giue the victory to the rest of his armie. The next morning, they gaue better order on euery side of the armie, and so marched forward: so that when the *PARTHIAN*s thought to returne againe to assaile them, they came farre short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come not to fight, but to spoyle and make hauock of all: when they came neare them, they were sore hurt with their slings and darts, and such other iauelings as the *ROMAN*es darterd at them, & the *PARTHIAN*s found them as rough and desperat in fight, as if they had bene fresh men they had delt withall. Wherevpon their harts beganne againe to faile them. But yet when the *ROMAN*es came to goe downe any steepe hills or mountaines, then they would set on them with their arrowes, because the *ROMAN*es could goe downe but fayer and softly. But then againe, the souldiers of the legion that caried great shields, returned backe, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed, in the midst amongst them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground, and so set downe their shields before them: and they of the second rancke also couered them of the first rancke, and the third also couered the second, and so from rancke to rancke all were couered. In somuch that this manner of couering and theading them selues with shields, was deuised after the facion of laying tiles vpon houses, and to fight, was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a most stronge defence and bulwarke against all arrowes and shot that falleth vpon it. When the *PARTHIAN*s saw this countenance of the *ROMAN*es souldiers of the legion, which kneeled on the ground in that sorte vpon one knee, supposing that they had bene wearied with trauell: they layed downe their bowes, & tooke their speares & lances, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the *ROMAN*es sodainly rose vpon their feete, and with the darts that they threw from them, they slue the foremost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of these daungers and lets, Antonius armie could winne no way in a day, by reason whereof they suffered great famine: for they could haue but litle corne, and yet were they driuen daily to fight for it, and besides that, they had no instruments to grynd it, to make bread of it. For the most part of them had bene left behind, because the beasts that caried them were either dead, or els employed to cary them that were fore and wounded. For the famine was so extreame great, that the eight parte of a bushell of wheate was sold for fifty Drachmas, and they sold barley bread by the weight of siluer. In the ende, they were compelled to liue of erbes and rootes, but they found few of them that men doe commonly eate of, and were enforced to tast of them that were neuer eaten before: among the which there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory was gone from him, and he knew no manner of thing, but onely busied him selfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had bene a matter of great weight, and to be done with all possible speede. All the campe ouer, men were busily stooping to the ground, digging and carying of stones from one place to another: but at the last, they cast vp a great deale of choller, and dyed sodainly, because they lacked wine, which was the onely soueraine remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius seeing such a number of his men dye daily, and that the PARTHANS left them not, neither would suffer them to be at rest: he oftentimes cryed out fighting, and sayd, O yenne throwland. He had the valliantnes of tenne throwland GRACIANS in such admiration, whome Xenophon brought away after the ouerthrow of CYRUS: because they had comen a farder iorney from BABYLON, and had also fought against much more enemies many tymes told, then them selues, and yet came home with safetie. The PARTHANS therefore seeing that they could not breake the good order of the armie of the ROMANES, and contrarily that they, them selues were oftentimes put to flight, and well assuredly beaten: they fell againe to their olde craftie subtilties. For when they found any of the ROMANES scattered from the armie to goe forrage, to seeke some corne, or other vittells: they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and shewed them their bowes vnbeaten, saying, that them selues also did returne home to their contry as they did, and that they would follow them no further, howbeit that they should yet haue certaine MEDS that would follow them a dayes iorney or two, to keepe them that they should doe no hurt to the villages from the high wayes: and so holding them with this talke, they gently tooke their leaue of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMANES began againe to thinke them selues safe. Antonius also vnderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine contry, because also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take this course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies campe, who was Cosen vnto Monezes that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whome he had giuen three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he praied them to bring him one that could speake the PARTHIAN, or SYRIAN tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a famillier of Antonius, was brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and sayde, that Monezes had sent him to Antonius, to requite the honor and curtesie he had shewed vnto him. After he had vsed this ceremonious speeche, he asked Alexander if he sawe those highe Mountaines a farte of, which he poynted vnto him with his finger. Alexander answered he did. The PARTHANS (sayd he) doe lye in ambushe at the foote of those Mountaines, vnder the which lyeth a goodly playne champion contry: and they thinke that you beeing deceived with their craftie subtil words, will leaue the way of the Mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painefull, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him assure him selfe to runne the same fortune that Marcus Crassus did. So Mithridates hauing sayd, he departed. Antonius was maruelously troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, & therefore called for his friends, to heare what they would say to it. The MARDIAN also that was their guide, being asked his opinion, answered: that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had sayd. For, sayd he, admit that there were no ambushe of enemies in the valley, yet is it a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountaine way, though it be stonye and painefull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole dayes trauelling without any water. So Antonius charging his first mind and determination, remoued that night, and tooke the Mountaine way, commanding euery man to provide him selfe of water. But the most part of them lacking vessels to cary water in, some were driuen to fill their fallets and murrions with water, and others also filled goates skinned to cary water in. Nowe they marching forward, worde was brought vnto the PARTHANS that they were remoued: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they presently followed them the selfe same night, so that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the ROMANES, who were so lame and wearied with going, and lacke of sleepe, that they were euen done. For, beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred

A and forty furlong, and further, to see their enemies so sodainly at their backs, that made them vterly despair: but mozte of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst, because they were forced to fight as they marched, to driue their enemies backe, yet creeping on still. The rereward of the armie by chaunce met with a riuer that was very cleere, and colde water, but it was faine and venomous to drinke: for straight it did gnawe the guts of those that had dronke it, and made them marcelous drye, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithstanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thrust them backe that would haue kept them from drinking: and so dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongst them, prayed them to take a litle patience for a while, for hard by there was another riuer that the water was excellent good to drinke: & that from thenceforward the way was so stony and ill for horsemen, that the enemies could followe them no further. So he caused the retreat to be sounded to call them backe that fought, and commanded the tents to be set vpe, that the souldiers might yet haue shadow to refresh them with. So when the tents were set vp, and the PARTHANS also rettyred according to their manner: the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like manner againe brought vnto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates aduised him, that after the armie had reposed a litle, the ROMANES should remoue forthwith, and with all possible speede get to the riuer: because the PARTHANS would goe no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report thereof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to bestowe vpon Mithridates. Mithridates tooke as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and so departed with speede. So Antonius sayd his campe being yet day light, and caused all his army to marche, & the PARTHANS neuer troubled any of them by the way: but amongst them selues it was as ill and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were Villens of their owne company, who cut their fellows throates for the money they had, and besides that, robbed the sumpters and cariage of such money as they caried: and at length, they set vpon Antonius slaues that draue his owne sumpters, and eariage, they brake goodly tables & riche plate in peeces, and deuided it among them selues. Thereupon all the campe was straight in tumult and vprore: For the residue of them were afraid it had bene the PARTHANS that had giuen them this alarom, and had put all the armie out of order. Inso much that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his slaues enfranchised that was of his gird, and made him giue him his faith that he would thrust his sword through him when he would bid him, and cut of his head: because he might not betaken aliue of his enemies, nor known when he were dead. This grieved his friends to the hart, that they burst out a weeping for sorrow. The MARDIAN also did comfort him; and assured him that the riuer he fought for was hard by, and that he did gesse it by a sweete moyst wind that breathed vpon them, and by the ayer which they found fresher then they were wont, and also, for that they fetched their wind more at libertie: and moreover, because that since they did set forward, he thought they were neare their iorneyes ende, not lacking much of day. On the other side also, Antonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetousnes and villany of certaine of his souldiers. Therefore Antonius to let his armie againe in order, and to pacifie this vprore, sounded the trompet that euery man should lodge. Now day began to breake, and the army to fall againe into good order, and all the hurly burly to cease, when the PARTHANS drewe neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereupon the signall of battell was giuen to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer them selues as they had done before with their shields, with the which they receiued & defended the force of the PARTHANS arrowes, who neuer durst any more come to hand strokes with them: and thus they that were in the vaward, went downe by litle and litle, till at length they tyed the riuer. There Antonius placed his armed men vpon the sands to receive and driue backe the enemies, and first of all gouer-ner his men that were sicke and hurt, and afterwards all the rest. And those also that were left F to resist the enemies, had leysure enough to drinke safely, and at their pleasure. For when the PARTHANS saw the riuer, they vnbeaten their bowes, and bad the ROMANES passe ouer without any feare, and greatly commended their valliantnes. When they had all passed ouer the ruier at their ease, they tooke a litle breath, and so marched forward againe, not greatly misting the PARTHIANS. The sixt day after this last battell, they came to the ruier of Araxes, which deuiceth the contry of ARMENIA from MADAIA: the which appeared vnto them very dangerous to passe, for the depth and swiftnesse of the streame. And furthermore, there ranne a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIANS lay in ambush thereabouts, and that they would come & set vpon them whilst they were troubled in passing ouer the ruier. But now, after they were all comen safely ouer without any danger, and that they had gotten to the other side, into the prouince of ARMENIA: then they worshipped that land, as if it had bene the first land they had seene after a long and dangerous voyage by sea, being now arrived in a safe and happy haven: and the teares ranne downe their cheekes, and euery man embraced eache other for the great ioy they had. But now, keeping the fields in this fruitful country so plentifull of all things, after so great a famine and want of all things: they so crammed them selues with such plenty of vittells, that many of them were cast into fluxes and dropies. There Antonius mustering his whole army, found that he had lost twenty thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, which had not all bene slayne by their enemies: for the most part of them dyed of sickness, making seuen and twenty dayes iorney, coming from the cite of PHRAATIA into ARMENIA, and hauing overcome the PARTHIANS in eigheteen severall battells. But these victories were not thoroughly performed nor accomplished, because they followed no long chase: and thereby it easily appeared, that Artabazus king of ARMENIA, had refused Antonius to end this warre. For if the sixteene thousand horsemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at these battells, considering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIANS manner, and acquainted also with their fight: When the ROMANES had put them to flight that fought a battell with them, & that these ARMENIANS had followed the chase of them that fled, they had not gathered them selues againe in force, neither durst they also haue returned to fight with them so often, after they had bene so many times overthrowen. Therefore, all those that were of any credit and countenance in the army, did perswade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this ARMENIAN king. But Antonius wisely dissembling his anger, he told him not of his treachery, nor gaue him the worse countenance, nor did him lesse honor then he did before: because he knew his armie was weake, & lacked things necessary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into ARMENIA with a great army, and so with fayer wordes, and sweete promises of Messengers, he allured Artabazus to come vnto him: whome he then kept prisoner, and led in triumphe in the cite of ALEXANDRIA. This greatly offended the ROMANES, and made them much to mislike it: when they saw that for Cleopatraes sake he deprived his contry of her due honor and glory, onely to gratifie the EGYPTIANS. But this was a pretty while after. Howbeit then, the great haste he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, caused him to put his men to so grea paines, forcing them to lye in the field all winter long when it new vnreasonably, that by the way he lost eight thousand of his men, and so came downe to the seafide with a small companye, to a certaine place called BLANCOVRG, which standeth betwixt the cities of BERYTUS and SIDON, and there taried for Cleopatra. And because he taried longer then he would haue had her, he pined away for loue and sorrow. So that he was at such a straight, that he wist not what to doe, and therefore, to weare it out, he gaue him selfe to quaffing and feasting. But he was so drowned with the loue of her, that he could not abide to sit at the table till the feast were ended: but many times while others banketted, he ranne to the sea side to see if she were coming. At length she came, and brought with her a worlde of apparell and money to giue vnto the souldiers. But some saye notwithstanding, that he brought apparell, but no money, and that she tooke of Antonius money, and caused it to be giuen amonge the souldiers in her owne name, as if she had giuen it them. In the meane time it chanced, that the king of the MEDES, and Phraortes, king of the PARTHIANS, fell at great warres together, the which began (as it is reported) for the spoiles of the ROMANES: and grew to be so hot betwene them, that the king of MEDES was no lesse afraid, then also in daunger to lose his whole Realme. Thereupon he sent vnto Antonius to pray him to come and make warre with the PARTHIANS, promising him that he would ayde him to his vttermost power. This put Antonius againe in good comfort, considering ring that vnlooked for, the onely thing he lacked, (which made him he could not overcome the PARTHIANS, meaning that he had not brought horsemen, and men with darts and slings enough) was offered him in that sort: that he did him more pleasure to accept it, then it was pleasure to the other to offer it. Hereupon, after he had spoken with the king of MEDES: at the ruier of Araxes, he prepared him selfe once more to goe through ARMENIA, and to make more cruell warre with the PARTHIANS, then he had done before. Now whilst Antonius was busie in this preparation, Octavia his wife, whome he had left at ROME, would needs take sea to come vnto him. Her brother Octavius Caesar was willing vnto it, not for his respect at all (as most authors doe report) as for that he might haue an honest culler to make warre with Antonius: if he did mislike her, and not esteeme of her as she ought to be. But when she was come to ATHENS, she received letters from Antonius, willing her to stay there vntill his coming, & did aduertise her of his iorney and determination. The which though it grieved her much, and that she knewe it was but an excuse: yet by her letters to him of answer, she asked him whether he would haue those things sent vnto him which she had brought him, being great store of apparell for souldiers, a great number of horse, summe of money, and gifts, to bestow on his friends and Captaines he had about him: and besides all those, she had two thousand souldiers chosen men, all well armed, like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger, one of Antonius friends whome he had sent vnto ATHENS, had brought these newes from his wife Octavia, and withall did greatly prayle her, as she was worthy, and well deferred: Cleopatra knowing that Octavia would haue Antonius from her, and fearing also that if with her vertue and honest behavior, (besides the great power of her brother Caesar) she did adde thereunto her modest kind loue to please her husband, that she would then be too stronge for her, and in the end winne him away: she furtly seemed to languish for the loue of Antonius, pynning her body for lacke of meate. Furthermore, she euery way so framed her countenance, that when Antonius came to see her, she cast her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauished for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, she fell a weeping and blubbering, looked ruffly of the matter, and still found the meane that Antonius should oftentimes finde her weeping: and then when he came sodainly vpon her, she made as though she dried her eyes, & turned the face away, as if she were vnwilling that he should see her weep. All these tricks the used, Antonius being in readines to goe into SYRIA, to speake with the king of MEDES. Then the flatterers that furthered Cleopatraes mind, blamed Antonius, and tolde him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had small loue in him, that would see a poore Lady in such torment for his sake, whose life depended onely vpon him alone. For Octavia, sayd they, that was married vnto him as it were of necessitie, because her brother Caesars affayres so required it: hath the honor to be called Antonius lawefull spouse and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of so many thousands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that the disdayned not so to be called, if it might please him the might enioy his company, and liue with him: but if he once leaue her, that then it is vnpossible he should liue. To be short, by these their flatteries and enticementes, they wrought Antonius effeminate mind, that fearing least he would make her selfe away: he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA, and referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following, although he receyued newes that the PARTHIANS at that tyme were at ciuill warres amonge them selues. This notwithstanding, he went afterwards and made peace with him. For he married his Daughter which was very younge, vnto one of the sonnes that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned, being fully bent to make warre with Caesar. When Octavia was returned to ROME from ATHENS, Caesar commaunded her to goe out of Antonius house, and to dwell by her selfe, because he had abused her. Octavia answered him againe, that she would not forsake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occasion to make warre with him, she prayed him then to take no thought for her: for sayd she, it were too shamefull a thing, that two so famous Captaines should bringe in ciuill warres amonge the ROMANES, the one for the loue of a womā, & the other for the ielously betwixt one another. Now as she spake the wordes, so did she also performe the deede. For she kept still in Antonius house, as if he had bene there, and very honestly and honorably kept his children, not those onely she had by him, but the other which her husband had by Fulvia. more, when Antonius sent any of his men to Rome, to sue for any office in the common wealth. He receiued him very courteously, and so vied her selfe vnto her brother, that he obtained the thing he requested. Howbeit thereby, thinking no hurt, she did Antonius great hurt. For her honest loue and regard to her husband, made euery man hate him, when they sawe he did so vnkindly vnto so noble a Lady: but yet the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the diuision of lands he made amongst his children in the cite of ALEXANDRIA. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and insolent a part, and done (as a man would say) in derision and contempt of the ROMANES. For he assembled all the people in the show place, where younge men doe exercise them selues, and there vpon a high tribunall situered, he set two chayres of gold, the one for him selfe, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chayres for his children: then he openly published before the assembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopatra Queene of ÆGYPT, of CYPRVS, of LYDIA, and of the lower SYRIA, and at that time also, Cesarion king of the same Realmes. This Cesarion was supposed to be the sonne of Iulius Cesar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly he called the sonnes he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the contry: and vnto Psolomy for his portion, PHENICIA, SYRIA, and CILICIA. And therewithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the facion of the MEDES, with a high copped tanke hat on his head, narrow in the toppe, as the kings of the MEDES and ARMENIANS doe vse to weare them: and Psolomy apparelled in a cloke after the MACEDONIAN manner, with slippers on his feete, and a broad hat, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attyre of the auncient kinges and successors of Alexander the great. So after his sonnes had done their humble duties, and killed their father and mother: presently a company of ARMENIAN souldiers set there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of the MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Cleopatra, she did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times els when she came abroad) the apparell of the goddess Isis, and so gaue audience vnto all her subiects, as a new Isis. Octavius Cesar reporting all these things vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people and assembly in Rome: he thereby stirred vp all the ROMANES against him. Antonius on thother side sent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefe poyntes of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that hauing spoyled Sextus Pompeius in SICILE, he did not giue him his parte of the Ile. Secondly, that he did deteyne in his hands the shippes he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, that hauing put Lepidus their companion and triumuirate out of his part of the Empire, and hauing deprived him of all honors: he retayned for him selfe the lands and reuenues thereof, which had bene assigned vnto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in manner deuided all ITALY amongst his owne souldiers, and had left no part of it for his souldiers. Octavius Cesar answered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had in deede deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did ouercruelly vse his authoritie. And secondly, for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should haue his part of them, so that he would likewise let him haue his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, that for his souldiers, they should seeke for nothing in ITALY, because they possessed MEDIA and PARTHIA, the which prouinces they had added to the Empire of Rome, valiantly fighting with their Emperor and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in ARMENIA, commaunded Canidius to goe presently to the sea side with his sixtene legions he had: and he him selfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the cite of EPHESVS, and there gathered together his galleies and shippes out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great shippes of burden: and of thole, Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred, and twenty thousand talents besides, and prouision of vittells also to mainteyne all the whole army in this warre. So Antonius, through the perswasions of Domitius, commaunded Cleopatra to returne againe into ÆGYPT, and there to vnderstand the successe of this warre. But Cleopatra, fearing least Antonius should againe be made friends with Octavius Cesar, by the meanes of his wife Octavia: she so plyed Canidius with money, and filled his purse, that he became her spokes man vnto Antonius, and told him there was no reason to send her from this warre, who desired so great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, because that thereby the ÆGYPTIANS would

A would then be vitterly discouraged, which were the chiefe strength of the army by sea; considering that he could see no king of all the kings their confederats, that Octavius Cesar was inferior vnto, either for wisdom or iudgement, seeing that longe before he had, wisely gouerned so great a realme as ÆGYPT, & besides that he had bene so long acquainted with him, by whom he had learned to maneage great assayres. These sayre perswasions wan him: for it was predestined that the gouernment of all the world should fall into Octavius Cesar's handes. Thus, all their forces being ioyned together, they hoied sayle towards the Ile of SAMOS, and there gaue them selues to feasts and sollace. For as all the kings, Princes, & communalities, peoples and cities from SYRIA, vnto the marishes Mæotides, and from the ARMENIANS to the ILLYRIANS, were sent vnto, to send and bringe all munition and warlike preparation they could: euen so all players, minstrells, tumblers, fooles, and iesters, were commaunded to assemble in the Ile of SAMOS. So that, where in manner all the world in euery place was full of lamentations, sighes and teares: onely in this Ile of SAMOS there was nothing for many dayes space, but singing and pypping, and all the Theater full of these common players, minstrells, and singing men. Besides all this, euery citie sent an oxe thither to sacrifice, and kings did giue one with another who should make the noblest feasts, & giue the richest gifts. So that euery man sayd, what can they doe more for ioy of victorie, if they winne the battell? When they make already such sumptuous feasts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of these minstrells, & such kind of people, the cite of PATRIS to keepe them withal, during this warre. Then he went vnto the cite of ATHENS, and there gaue him selfe againe to see playes and pastimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other side, being ielous of the honors which Octavia had receiued in this citie, where in deede she was marvellously honored and beloued of the ATHENIANS: to winne the peoples good will also as ATHENS, he gaue them great gifts: and they likewise gaue her many great honors, and appointed certain Ambassadors to cary the decree to her house, among the which Antonius was one, who as a Citizen of ATHENS reported the matter vnto her, & made an oration in the behalfe of the citie. Afterwards he sent to Rome to put his wife Octavia out of his house, who (as it is reported) went out of his house with all Antonius children, sauing the eldest of them he had by Fulvia, who was with her father, bewailing & lamenting her curled hap that had brought her to this, that she was accompanied one of the chiefe causes of this ciuill warre. The ROMANES did pitie her, but much more Antonius, & those specially that had bene Cleopatra: who, neither excelled Octavia in beawtie, nor yet in young yeares. Octavius Cesar vnderstanding the iocand & wonderful great preparation of Antonius, he was not a little astonied at it, (fearing he should be driuen to fight that sommer) because he wanted many things, & the great and grievous exactions of money did sorely oppresse the people. For all manner of men els, were driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenue: but the Libertines, (to wete, those whose fathers or other predecessors had some time bene bond men) they were sessed to pay the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereuppon, there rose a wonderfull exclamation and great vprore all ITALY ouer: so that among the greatest faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him most, for that he delayed to giue Cesar battell. For he gaue Cesar leysure to make his preparations, and also to appeale the complaints of the people. When such a great summe of money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grew to mutinie vpon it: but when they had once paid it, they remembered it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancius (two of Antonius chiefe friends and that had bene both of them Consuls) for the great injuries Cleopatra did them, because they hindered all they could, that she should not come to this warre: they went and yelded them selues vnto Cesar, and tolde him where the resentment was that Antonius had made, knowing perfidy what was in it. The will was in the custodie of the Vestall Nunnes: of whom Cesar demanded for it. They answered him, that they would not giue it him: but if he would goe and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereuppon Cesar went thither, & hauing red it first to him selfe, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch: so assembling all the Senate, he red it before them all. Whereuppon diuers were marvellously offended, and thought it a strange matter that he being alieue, should be punished for that he had appoynted by his will to be done after his death. Cesar chiefly tooke hold of this that he

ordeyned touching his buriall: for he willed that his bodie, though he dyed at Rome, should be brought in funerall pompe through the middelt of the market place, and that it should be sent into ALEXANDRIA vnto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among diuers other faultes wherewith Antonius was to be charged, for Cleopatraes sake: Calpurnius, one of Cæsars friends reproved him, because he had frankly giuen Cleopatra all the libraries of the royall cite of PERGAMVM, in the which she had about two hundred thousand feuerall bookes. Again also, that being one time set at the table, he suddenly rose from the borde, and trode vpon Cleopatraes foote, which was a signe giuen betwene them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffred the EPHESTIANS in his preference to call Cleopatra, their fouraine Ladye. That diuers times fitting in his tribunall and chayer of state, giuing audience to all kings and Princes: he had receiued loue letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of onyx or cristall, and that he had read them, sitting in his imperial seate. That one day when FURNIUS, a man of great accompt, and the eloquentest man of all the ROMANES, pleaded a matter before him: Cleopatra by chaunce coming through the market place in her litter where FURNIUS was a pleading: Antonius straight rose out of his seate, and left his audience to followe her litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Calpurnius deuided the most part of all these accusations of his owne head. Neuertheles they that loued Antonius, were intercessors to the people for him, and amongst them they sent one Geminus vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heede, that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the people of Rome. This Geminus being arriued in GRECE, made Cleopatra ielous straight of his coming: because she furnished that he came not but to speake for OCTAUIA. Therefore the spared not to tawnt him all supper tyme, and moreover to spyte him the more, she made him be set lowest of all at the borde, the which he tooke patiently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius. Now Antonius commaunding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither: he answered him; that it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morrow morning fasting: but dronke or fasting, howsoeuer it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his side: vnles Cleopatra were sent backe into EGYPT. Antonius tooke these wordes in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side answered him, thou dost well Geminus, sayd she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within fewe dayes after, Geminus stole away, and fled to Rome. The flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her driue many other of Antonius faithfull seruants and friends from him, who could not abide the iniuries done vnto them: amonge the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer: who wrote that he fled, because her Phisitian Glaucus tolde him, that Cleopatra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore he had Cleopatraes displeasure, because he sayde one night at supper, that they made them drinke fower wine, where Sarmentus at Rome dranke good wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleasaunt young boye, such as the Lordes of Rome are wont to haue about them to make them pastyme, which they call their ioyes, and he was OCTAUIUS Cæsars boye. Nowe, after Cæsar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaimed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolishe the power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before giuen it yppe vnto a woman. And Cæsar sayde furthermore, that Antonius was not Maister of him selfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him beside him selfe, by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be MARDIAN the Euenuke, Photinus, and Iras, a woman of Cleopatraes bedchamber, that frised her heare, and dressed her head, and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many signes & wonders fel out. First of all, the cite of PISAVRVM which was made a colony to Rome, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing vpon the shore side of the sea Adriatick, was by a terrible earthquake sonck into the ground. One of the images of stone which was set vp in the honor of Antonius, in the cite of ALBA, did sweare many dayes together: and though some wyped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the cite of PATRAS, whilest Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the cite of ATHENS also, in a place where the warre of the gyants against the goddes is set out in magerie: the statue of Bacchus with a terrible winde was throwen downe in the Theater.

A It was sayd that Antonius came of the race of Hercules, as you haue heard before, and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus: and therefore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the same blustering storme of wind, ouerthrew the great monstrous images at ATHENS, that were made in the honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named and inteaured, the Antonians, and yet they did hurt none of the other images which were many besides. The Admirall galley of Cleopatra, was called Antonide, in the which there enchaunced a marvelous ill signe. Swallows had bred vnder the poope of her shippe, & there came others after them that draue away the first, & plucked downe their nealls. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight: it was found that Antonius had no lesse then two hundred good ships of warre, amonge the which there were many galleies that had eight & ten banks of oars, the which were sumptuously furnished, not so meete for fight, as for triumphe: abounded with thousand footemen, & twelve thousand horsemen, & had with him to ayde him these kinges and subiects following. Bocchus king of LYBIA, Tarcondemus king of high CILICIA, Antiochus king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of CAPPADOCIA, and Adalus king of THRACIA. All the which were there every man in person. The residue that were absent sent their armies, as Polemo king of PONT, Manachus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of IUDY: & furthermore, Amyntas king of LYCAONIA, & of the GALATIANS: and besides all these, he had all the ayde the king of MEDES sent vnto him. Now for Cæsar, he had two hundred and fifty shippes of warre, foure score thousand footemen, & well neare as many horsemen as his enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all vnder his dominiõ from ARMENIA, & the riuier of Euphrates, vnto the sea IONIVM & ILLYRICVM. Octavianus Cæsar had also for his part, all that which was in our HEMISPHERE, or halfe part of the world, from ILLYRIA vnto the Ocean sea vpon the west: then all from the Ocean, vnto Mare Siculus: & from AFRICA, all that which is against ITALY, as GAULE, & SPAYNE. Furthermore, all from the prouince of CYRENIA, vnto ETHIOPIA, was subiect vnto Antonius. Now Antonius was made so subiect to a womans will, that though he was a great deale the stronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes sake, he would needs haue this battell tryed by sea: though he sawe before his eyes, that for lacke of water men, his Captaines did presse by force all sortes of men out of GRECE: that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muletters, reapers, haruest men, and yonge boyes, and yet could they not sufficiently furnishe his galleies: so that the most part of them were empty, and could scant rowe, because they lacked water men enow. But on the contrary side, Cæsars shippes were not built for pompe, highe, and great, onely for a fight and brauery, but they were light of yarge, armed and furnished with water men as many as they needed, and had them all in readines, in the hauens of TARENTVM, and BRINDYSIVM. So Octavianus Cæsar sent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his army into ITALY: and that for his owne part he would giue him safe harbor, to lande without any trouble, and that he would withdraw his armie from the sea, as farre as one horse could runne, vntil he had put his army a shore, & had lodged his men. Antonius on the other side brauely sent him word againe, and challenged the combat of him man to man, though he were the elder: and that if he refused him so, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIA. As Julius Cæsar, and Pompey had done before. Now whilest Antonius rode at anker, lying idely in harbor at the head of ACTIVM, in the place where the cite of NICOPOLIS standeth at this present, Cæsar had quickly passed the sea Ionium, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius vnderstoode that he had taken shippe. Then began his men to be affraid, because his army by land was left behind. But Cleopatra making light of it: and what daunger, I pray you, said she, Cæsar keepe at TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with full force of owers in battell against him, Antonius was affraid that if they came to ioyne, they would take and cary away his shippes that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his water men, and set them in order of battell vpon the forecattell of their shippes, and then lift vp all his rancks of owers towards the element, as well of the one side, as the other, with the prooes against the enemies, at the entry and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIVM, and so kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furnished with water men and souldiers. Thus Octavianus Cæsar beinge finely deceyued by this stratageme, retyred presently, and therewithall Antonius very wisely and sodainly did cut him off from fresh water. For, vnderstanding that the places where Ostanius Caesar landed, had very little store of water, and yet very bad: he shut them in with stronge ditches and trenches he cast, to keepe them from salying out at their pleasure, and so to goe seeke water further of. Furthermore, he delt very friendly and courteously with Domitius, and against Cleopatras mynde. For he being sicke of an agewe when he went and tooke a little boate to goe to Caesars campe, Antonius was very fory for it, but yet he sent after him all his cariage, trayne, and men: and the same Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderstand that he repented his open treason, he died immediately after. There were certain kings also that forsooke him, and turned on Caesars side: as Amyntas, and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleet and navy that was vnfortunate in all thinges, and vngeddy for seruice, compelled him to change his minde, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his army by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination: he turned him cleane contrary, and counseled him to send Cleopatra backe againe, and him selfe to retyre into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES, promised him to ayde him with a great power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonor to him to let Caesar haue the sea, (because him selfe & his men both had bene well practised & exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of SICILIA against Sextus Pompeius) but rather that he should doe against all reason, he hauing so great skill and experience of battells by land as he had, if he should not employ the force and valliantnes of so many lusty armed footemen as he had ready, but would weaken his army by deuiding them into shippes. But now, notwithstanding all these good persuasions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of battell by sea: considering with her selfe how he might sie, & prouide for her safetie, not to helpe him to winne the victory, but to fie more easily after the battell lost. Betwixt Antonius campe & his fleet of shippes, there was a great high point of firme lande that ranne a good way into the sea, the which Antonius often vied for a walke, without mistrust of feare or danger. One of Caesars men perceiued it, & told his Maister that he would laugh & they could take vp Antonius in the middelt of his walke. Thereupon Caesar sent some of his men to lye in ambush for him, & they missed not much of taking of him: for they tooke him that came before him, because they discouered to soone, & so Antonius escaped verie hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by sea, he set all the other shippes a fire, but three score shippes of EGYPT, & reserved onely but the best & greatest gallies, D from three bancks, vnto renne bancks of owers. Into them he put two & twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters & slingers. Now, as he was setting his men in order of battel, there was a Capitaine, & a valliant man, that had serued Antonius in many battels & conflicts, & had all his body hacked & cut: who as Antonius passed by him, cryed out vnto him, & sayd: O, noble Emperor, how commeth it to passe that you trust to these vile brittle shippes? what doe you mistrust these woundes of myne, and this sword? let the EGYPTIANS & *PHENICIAN*s fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vse to conquer, or to be slayne on our feete. Antonius passed by him, and sayd neuer a word, but onely beckoned to him with his hand & head, as though he willed him to be of good corage, although in deede he had no great corage him selfe. For when the Masters of the gallies & Pilots would haue let their failes alone, he made them clapp them on, saying to culler the matter withall, that not one of his enemies should scape. All that day, & the three dayes following, the sea rose so high, & was so boysterous, that the battel was put off. The fifth day the storme ceased, & the sea calmed againe, & the they rowed with force of owers in bataille one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, & Calpurnius the left, & Marcus Octavius, & Marcus Tullius the middelt. Ostanius Caesar on thother side, had placed Agrippa in the left winge of his armye, and had kept the right winge for him selfe. For the armies by land, Canidius was generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Caesars side: who kept their men in battell raye the one before the other, vpon the sea side, without stirring one agaynst the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaynes: Antonius being in a swift pinnace, was caried vp and downe by force of owers through his army, & spake to his people to encourage them to fight valliantly, as if they were on maine land, because of the steadines & heauines of their shippes: & commaunded the Pilots & masters of the gallies,

A gallies, that they should not sturre, none otherwise then if they were at anker, and so to receiue the first charge of their enemies, and that they should not goe out of the straight of the gulfe. Caesar berymes in the morning going out of his tent, to see his shippes thorough out met a man by chance that draue an asse before him. Caesar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him, his name was Eutychnus, to say, fortunate: and his asse's name Nicon, to say, Conquerer. Therefore Caesar after he had wonne the battell, setting out the market place with the spures of the gallies he had taken, for a signe of his victorie: he caused also the man and his asse to be set vp in brasse. When he had visted the order of his armie thorough out, he tooke a little pinnace, and went to the right wing, and wondered when he sawe his enemies lye still in the straight, & sturred not. For, decerning them a farr off, men would haue thought they had bene shippes riding at anker, and a good while he was so periuaded: So he kept his gallies eight furlong from his enemies. About noone there rose a litle gale of winde from the sea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with taryng so long, and trusting to the greatnes and height of their shippes, as if they had bene inuincible: they began to march forward with their left wing. Caesar seeing that, was a glad man, and began a litle to giue backe from the right wing, to allure them to come further out of the straight & gulfe: to thend that he might with his light shippes well manned with water men, turne and enuiron the gallies of the enemies, the which were heauy of yarage, both for their biggenes, as also for lacke of watermen to row them. When the skirmish began, and that they came to ioyne, there was no great hurt at the first meeting, neither did the shippes vehemently hit one against the other, as they doe commonly in fight by sea. For on the one side, Antonius shippes for their heauines, could not haue the strength and swiftnes to make their blowes of any force: and Caesars shippes on thother side tooke great heede, not to rushe & shooke with the fore castells of Antonius shippes, whose proues were armed with great brassen spures. Furthermore they durst not flanketh them, because their points were easily broken, which way soeuer they came to set vpon his shippes, that were made of great mayne square peeces of tymber, bounde together with great iron pinnes: so that the battel was much like to a battel by land, or to speake more properly, to the assault of a citie. For there were alwaies three or foure of Caesars shippes about one of Antonius shippes, and the fouldiers fought with their pykes, halberds, and darts, and threw pots and darts with fire. Antonius ships on the other side bestowed among them, with their crowsbowes and engines of battery, great store of shot from their high towers of wodde, that were upon their shippes. Now Publicola seeing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Caesars army, to compasse in Antonius shippes that fought: he was driuen allo to loofe off to haue more roome, & going a litle at one side, to put thole further of that were affraid, and in the middelt of the battel. For they were fore distressed by Aruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victorie doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when sodainly they saw the three score shippes of Cleopatra busie about their yard masts, and hoysing saile to fie. So they fled through the middelt of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great shippes, & did marvellously disorder the other shippes. For the enemies them selues wondred much to see them saile in that fort, with full saile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius shewed plainly, that he had not onely lost the corage and hart of an Emperor, but also of a valliant man, & that he was not his owne man: (proving that true which an old man spake in myrrh, that the soule of a louer liued in another body, and not in his owne) he was so caried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, & that she could not haue removed without mouing of him also. For when he saw Cleopatras shippe vnder saile, he forgot, forsooke, & betrayed them that fought for him, & imbarcked vpon a galley with fise bankes of owers, to follow her that had already begon to ouerthrow him, & would in the end be his vtter destruction. When she knew this galley a farr off, she lift vp a signe in the poope of her shippe, and so Antonius comming to it, was plucked vp where Cleopatra was, howbeit he saw her not at his first comming, nor the him, but went and fate down alone in the prow of his shippe, and said neuer a word, clapping his head betwene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantynes of Caesars that followed him hard. So Antonius straight turned the prow of his shippe, and presently put the rest to flight, sauing one Eurycles LACEDEMONIAN, that followed him neare, and prest vpon him with great corage, shaking a dart in his hand ouer the prow, as though he would haue throwen it vnto Antonius. Antonius seing him, came to the forecassell of his ship, & asked him what he was that durst follow Antonius to neare? I am, answered he, Eurycles the sonne of Lachares, who through *Cesar*s good fortune seeketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of felonnie, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durst not venter on Antonius shippe, but fet vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two) and fell with him with such a blowe of his brassen spur, that was so heauy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was laden with very rich stuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he returned againe to his place, and sate downe, speaking neuer a word as he did before: and so liued three dayes alone, without speaking to any man. But when he arriued at the head of Tanarus, there *Cleopatra*s women first brought Antonius and Cleopatra to speake together, and afterwards, to suppe and lyetogether. Then beganne there agayne a great number of Marchaunts shippes to gather about them, and some of their friends that had escaped from this ouerthrow: who brought newes, that his army by sea was ouerthrowen, but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. The Antonius then vnto Canidius, to returne with his army into ASIA, by MACEDON. Now for him selfe, he determined to crosse ouer into AFRICK, & toke one of his carrets or hulks laden with gold and siluer, and other rich cariage, and gaue it vnto his friends: commanding them to depart, and to seeke to saue them selues. They answered him weeping, that they would nether doe it, nor yet forsake him. Then Antonius very curteously and louingly did comfort them, and prayed them to depart: and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernor of CORINTHE, that he would see them safe, and helpe to hidethem in some secret place, vntil they had made their way and peace with Cesar. This Theophilus was the father of Hipparchus, who was had in great estimation about Antonius. He was the first of all his infranchised bondmen that reuolued from him, and yielded vnto Cesar, and afterwards went and dwelt at CORINTHE. And thus it stood with Antonius. Now for his armie by sea, that fought before the head or foreland of ACTIUM: they helde out a long tyme, and nothing troubled them more then a great boysterous wind that rose full in the prooes of their shippes, and yet with much a doe, his navy was at length ouerthrowen, fise howers within night. There were not slaine about fise thousand men: but yet there were three hundred shippes taken, as Octavianus Cesar writeth him selfe in his commentaries. Many plainly sawe Antonius fle, and yet could hardly beleue it, that he that had nyntene legions whole by lande, and twelue thousand horsmen vpon the sea side, would so haue forsaken them, and haue fled so cowardly: as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one and the other fortune, & that he had not bene thoroughly acquainted with the diuers chaunges and fortunes of battells. And yet his souldiers still wished for him, and euer hoped that he would come by some meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they shewed them selues so valliant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainly knewe he was fled, they kept them selues whole together seven daies. In the ende Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forsaking his campe: when they saw them selues thus destitute of their heads and leaders, they yielded themselves vnto the stronger. This done, Cesar sailed towards ATHENS, and there made peace with the GRECIANS, and deuided the rest of the come that was taken vp for Antonius army, vnto the townes and cities of GRECE, the which had bene brought to extreme misery & pouerty, cleane without money, slaues, horse, & other beastes of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarcho tolde, that all the Citizens of our cite of CHERONEA (not one excepted) were driuen them selues to cary a certaine measure of come on their shoulders to the sea side, that lieth directly ouer against the Ile of ANTICTRA, & yet were they driuen thether with whippes. They caried it thus but once: for, the second tyme that they were charged againe to make the like cariage, all the come being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had lost the battell, & so escaped our poore city. For Antonius souldiers & deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the come amongst them. Antonius being arriued in LIBYA, he sent Cleopatra before into ÆGYPT from the cite of PARETONIVS: & he him selfe remained very solitary, hauing onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandered vp & down, both of them orators, the one Aristocrates a GRECIAN, & the other Lucilius

Aelius a ROMANE. Of whom we haue written in an other place, that at the battell where Brutus was ouerthrowen, by the cite of PHILIPPES, he came & willingly put him selfe into the hands of those that followed Brutus, saying that it was he: bicause Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to saue him selfe. And afterwards bicause Antonius saued his life, he still remained with him: and was very faithfull and friendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had trusted with the gouernment of LIBYA, and vnto whom he had geuen the charge of his armie there, had yielded vnto Cesar: he was so made withall, that he would haue slaine him selfe for anger, had not his frendes about him withstoode him, and kept him from it. So he went vnto ALEXANDRIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderful enterprise, and of great attempt. Betwixt the redde sea, and the sea betweene the landes that poynt vpon the coast of ÆGYPT, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the seas; and separateth AFRICK from ASIA: the which straight is so narrow at the end where the two seas are narrowest, that it is not about three hundred furlonges ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her shippes out of the one sea, and to hale them ouer the straight into the other sea: that when her shippes were come into this goulfe of ARABIA, she might then carie all her gold & siluer away, and so with a great companie of men goe and dwell in some place about the Ocean sea farte from the sea Meditteranium, to scape the danger and bondage of this warre. But now, bicause the ARABIANS dwelling about the cite of PETRA, did burne the first shippes that were brought alande, and that Antonius thought that his armie by lande, which he left at ACTIUM was yet whole: the left of her enterprise, and determined to keepe all the portes and passages of her realme. Antonius, he forooke the cite and companie of his frendes, and built him a house in the sea, by the Ile of PHAROS, vpon certaine forced mountes which he caused to be cast into the sea, and dwelt there, as a man that banished him selfe from all mens companie: saying that he would lead Timons life, bicause he had the like wrong offered him, that was affore offered vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankfulness of those he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his frendes, he was angry with all men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a citizen of ATHENS, that liued about the warre of PELOPONNESVS, as appeareth by Plato, and Aristophanes comedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a vyper, & malicious man vnto mankind, to shunne all other mens companies, but the companie of young Alcibiades, a bolde and insolent youth, whom he would greatly feast, and make much of, and kissed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cause what he ment to make so much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon answered him, I do it sayd he, bicause I know that one day he shall do great mischief vnto the ATHENIANS. This Timon sometimes would haue Apemantus in his companie, bicause he was much like to his nature & condicions, and also followed him in manner of life. On a time when they solemnly celebrated the feasts called Chœ at ATHENS, (to wit, the feasts of the dead, where they make sprinklings and sacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feasted together by them selues, Apemantus said vnto the other: O, here is a trimme banket Timon. Timon answered againe, yea said he, so thou wert not here. It is reported of him also, that this Timon on a time (the people being assembled in the market place about dispatch of some affaires) got vp into the pulpit for Orations, where the Orators commonly vse to speake vnto the people: & silence being made, euerie man listning to heare what he would say, bicause it was a wonder to see him in that place: at length he began to speake in this manner. My Lordes of ATHENS, I haue a litle yard in my house where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens haue haged them selues: & bicause I meane to make some building vpon the place, I thought good to let you all vnderstand it, that before the figge tree be cut downe, if any of you be desperate, you may there in time goe hang your selues. He dyed in the cite of HALLES, and was buried vpon the sea side. Nowe it chaunced so, that the sea getting in, it compassed his tombe rounde about, that no man coulde come to it: and vpon the same was wrytten this epitaphe.

Here lies a wretched corse, of wretched soule bereft, Seeke not my name: a plague consume you wicked wretches left.

It is reported, that Timon him selfe when he liued made this epitaphe: for that which is

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle shall suffice at this present. But now to returne to Antonius againe, Canidius him selfe came to bring him newes, that he had lost all his armie by land at ACTIVM. On thother side he was aduerfed also, that Herodes king of IVRTE, who had also certeine legions and bandes with him, was reuolted vnto Cesar, and all the other kings in like maner: so that, sauing those that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithstanding did nothing trouble him, and it seemed that he was contented to forgoe all his hope, and so to be ridde of all his care and troubles. Thereupon he left his solitarie houle he had built in the sea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra receiued him into her royall pallace. He was no sooner comen thither, but he straight set all the city of rioting and banketing againe, and him selfe, to liberalitie and gifts. He caused the sonne of Iulius Cesar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the maner of the ROMANS) amongst the number of young men: & gaue Anryllus, his eldest sonne he had by Fulvia, the mans gowne, the which was a plaine gowne, without gart or imbroderie of purple. For these things, there was kept great feasting, banketing, and dauncing in ALEXANDRIA many dayes together. In deece they did breake their first order they had let downe, which they called Ammetobion, (as much to say, no life comparable) & did set vp another which they called Synapothanumion (signifying the order and agreement of those that will dye together) the which in exceeding sumptuousnes and cost was not inferior to the first. For their frendes made them selues to be inrolled in this order of those that would dye together, and so made great feastes one to another: for euerie man when it came to his turne, feasted their whole companie and fraternitie. Cleopatra in the meane time was verie carefull in gathering all sorts of poysons together to destroy men. Now to make proofe of those poysons which made men dye with least paine, she tried it vpon condemned men in prison. For when she saw the poysons that were sodaine and vehement, and brought speedy death with grievous torments: & in contrary maner, that suche as were more milde and gentle, had not that quick speede and force to make one dye sodainly: the afterwarde went about to proue the stinging of snakes and adders, and made some to be applied vnto men in her sight, some in one sorte, and some in an other. So when she had dayly made diuers and sundrie proofes, she found none of all them she had proued so fit, as the biting of an Aspicke, the which only causeth a heauines of the head, without swoounding or complaining, and bringeth a great desire also to sleepe, with a litle sweet in the face, and so by litle and litle taketh away the senses and vitall powers, no liuing creature perceiuing that the pacientes feelee any paine. For they are so sorie when any bodie waketh them, and taketh them vp: as those that being taken out of a sound sleepe, are very heauy and desirous to sleepe. This notwithstanding, they sent Ambassadors vnto Octavius Caesar in ASIA, Cleopatra requesting the realme of EGYPT for her children, and Antonius praying that he might be suffered to lue at ATHENS like a priuate man, if Cesar would not let him remaine in EGYPT. And because they had no other men of estimation about them, for that some were fledde, and those that remained, they did not greatly trust them: they were inforced to sende Euphronius the schoolemaister of their children. For Alexas LAODICIAN, who was brought into Antonius houle and fauor by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other GRACIAN: (for that he had halway bene one of Cleopatras ministers to win Antonius, and to ouerthrow all his good determinations to vse his wife Octauia well) him Antonius had sent vnto Herodes king of IVRTE, hoping still to keepe him his friend, that he should not reuolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he should haue kept Herodes from reuolting from him, he perswaded him to turne to Cesar: & trusting king Herodes, he presumed to come in Cesars presence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleasure: for he was presently taken prisoner, and sent in chaines to his owne contrie, & there by Cesars commandement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cesar would not graunt vnto Antonius requests: but for Cleopatra, he made her aunswere, that he would deny her nothing reasonable, so that she would either put Antonius

to death, or driue him out of her contrie. Therewithall he sent Thyrenus one of his men vnto her, a verie wife and discrete man, who bringing letters of credit from a young Lorde vnto a noble Ladie, and that besides greatly liked her beawtie, might easely by his eloquence haue perswaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man else was, and the Queene her selfe also did him great honor: inso much as he made Antonius jealous of him. Whereupon Antonius caused him to be taken and well fauoredly whipped, and so sent him vnto Cesar: and bad him tell him that he made him angrie with him, because he shewed him selfe proude and diddainsfull towards him, and now specially when he was easie to be angered, by reason of his present miserie. To be short, if this milke thee said he, thou hast Hipparchus one of my infranchised bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleasure, that we may breake quiettaunce. From thenceforth, Cleopatra to cleere her selfe of the suspition he had of her, she made more of him then euer she did. For first of all, where she did solemnise the day of her birth very meanelly and sparingly, fit for her present misfortune: (the now in contrary manner did keepe it with such solemnitie, that she exceeded all measure of sumptuousnes and magnificence: so that the ghests that were bidden to the feasts, and came poore, went away rich. Nowe things passing thus, Agrippa by diuers letters sent one after an other vnto Cesar, prayed him to returne to ROME, because the affaires there did of necessity require his person and presence. Thereupon he did deferre the warre till the next yeare following: but when winter was done, he returned againe through SYRIA by the coast of AFRICK, to make warres against Antonius, and his other Captaines. When the cite of PELVSIUM was taken, there ran a rumor in the cite, that Seleucus, by Cleopatras consent, had surrendered the same. But to cleere her selfe that she did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be reuenged of them at his pleasure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many sumptuous tombes and monumentes, as well for excellencie of workemanhippe, as for height and greatnes of building, ioyning hard to the temple of Isis. Thither she caused to be brought all the treasure & pretious things she had of the auncient kings her predeceffors: as gold, silver, emerods, pearles, ebbanie, iuorie, and sinnamon, and besides all that, a maruelous number of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Octavius Caesar being affrayed to loosee suche a treasure and masse of riches, and that this woman for spight would set it a fire, and burne it euery whit: he alwayes sent some one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whilest he in the meane time drewe neere the cite with his armie. So Cesar came, and pitched his campe hard by the city, in the place where they runne and manage their horses. Antonius made a saly vpon him, and fought verie valiantly, so that he draue Cesars horsemen backe, fighting with his men euen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boasting of this victorie, and sweetely kissed Cleopatra, armed as he was, when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valiantly fought in this skirmish. Cleopatra to reward his manlines, gaue him an armor and head peece of cleane gold: howbeit the man at armes when he had receiued this rich gift, stole away by night, and went to Cesar. Antonius sent againe to chalenge Cesar, to fight with him hand to hande. Cesar answered him, that he had many other wayes to dye then so. Then Antonius seeing there was no way more honorable for him to dye, then fighting valiantly: he determined to sette vp his rest, both by sea and lande. So being at supper, (as it is reported) he commaunded his officers and household seruantes that waited on him at his bord, that they should fill his cuppes full, and make as much of him as they could: for said he, you know not whether you shall doe so much for me to morrow or not, or whether you shall serue an other maister: and it may be you shall see me no more, but a dead bodie. This notwithstanding, perceiuing that his frends and men sell a weeping to heare him say so: to salue that he had spoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not leade them to battell, where he thought not rather safely to returne with victorie, then valiantly to dye with honor. Furthermore, the selfe came night within litle of midnight, when all the cite was quiet, full of feare, and sorrowe, thinking what would be the issue and ende of this warre: it is said that sodainly they heard a maruelous sweete harmonie of sundrie sortes of instruments of musicke, with the crie of a multitude of people, as they had bene dauncing, and had long as they vse in Bacchus feastes, with mouings and turnings after the

maner of the Satyres : & it seemed that this daunce went through the city vnto the gate that A opened to the enemies, & that all the troupe that made this noise they heard, went out of the city at that gate. Now, such as in reason sought the depth of the interpretation of this wonder, thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare singular deuotion to counterfeite and resemble him, that did forsake them. The next morning by breake of day, he went to set those few footemen he had in order vpon the hills adioyning vnto the citie: and there he stoode to behold his gallies which departed from the hauen, and rowed against the gallies of his enemies, and so stoode still, looking what exploit his souldiers in them would do. But when by force of rowing they were come nere vnto them, they first saluted Cæsars men: and then Cæsars men resaluted them also, and of two armies made but one, and then did all together row toward the citie. When Antonius sawe that his men did forsake him, and yielded vnto Cæsar, and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowen: he then fled into the citie, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them, with whom he had made warre for her sake. Then she being affraied of his fury, fled into the tombe which the had caused to be made, and there locked the dores vnto her, and shut all the springes of the lockes with great boltes, and in the meane time sent vnto Antonius to tell him that she was dead. Antonius beleueing it, said vnto him selfe: what doest thou looke for further, Antonius, fith spierfull fortune hath taken from thee the only ioy thou haddest, for whom thou yet reseruedst thy life? when he had sayd these words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed him selfe, and being naked said thus: O Cleopatra, it grieueth me not that I haue lost thy companie, for I will not be long from thee: but I am fory, that hauing bene so great a Captaine and Emperour, I am in deede condemned to be iudged of lesse corage and noble minde, then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and trusted much, and whom he had long before caused to sweare vnto him, that he should kill him when he did commaunde him: and then he willed him to keepe his promise. His man drawing his sworde, list it vp as though he had ment to haue stricken his maister: but turning his head at one side, he thrust his sword into him selfe, and fell downe dead at his maisters foote. Then said Antonius, O noble Eros, I thank thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to shew me what I should doe to my selfe, which thou couldest not doe for me. Therewithall he tooke his sword, and thrust it into his bellie, and so fell downe vpon a litle bed. The wounde he had killed him not presently, for the blood stinted a litle when he layed: and when he came somewhat to him selfe againe, he praied them that were about him to dispatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out & tormenting him selfe: vntill at last there came a secretarie vnto him called Diomedes, who was commaunded to bring him into the tombe or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that she was aliue, he verie earnestlie prayed his men to carie his bodie thither, and so he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithstāding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and cast out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was trussed: and Cleopatra her owne selfe, with two women only, which she had suffered to come with her into these monumentes, trised Antonius vp. They that were present to behold it, said they neuer saw for pitiefull a sight. For, they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloody as he was, and drawing on with pang of death, who holding vp his hands to Cleopatra, raised vp him selfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him vp: but Cleopatra stowping downe with her head, putting to all her strength to her vtermost power, did lift him vp with much a doe, and neuer let goe her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good corage, and were as forie to see her labor so, as the her selfe. So when she had gotten him in after that sorte, and layed him on a bed: she rent her garments vpon him, clapping her brest, and scratching her face & stomake. Then she dried vp his blood that had berayed his face, and called him her Lord, her husband, and Emperour, forgetting her owne miserie and calamity, for the pitie and compassion she tooke of him. Antonius made her cease her lamenting, and called for wine, either because he was a thirst, or else for that he thought thereby to hasten his death. Vn when he had dronke, he earnestly prayed her, and persuaded her, that she would seeke to saue her life, if she could possible, without reproache and dishonor: and that chiefly she should trust Proculeius about any man else about Cæsar. And as for

for him selfe, that she should not lament nor sorowe for the miserable change of his fortune at the end of his dayes: but rather that she should thinke him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes & honors he had receiued, considering that while he liued he was the noblest and greatest Prince of the world, & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a Roman by an other Roman. As Antonius gaue the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was sent from Cæsar. For after Antonius had thrust his sword in him selfe, as they caried him into the tombes and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his gard called Deceus, tooke his sword with the which he had stricken him selfe, and hidde it: then he secretly stole away, and brought Officiarius Cæsar the first newes of his death, & shewed him his sword that was bloodied. Cæsar hearing these newes, straight withdrew him selfe into a secret place of his tent, and there burst out with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had bene his frende and brother in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in sundry great exploitres and battells. Then he called for all his frendes, and shewed them the letters Antonius had written to him, and his answeres also sent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: & how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to all iust and reasonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he sent Proculeius, and commaunded him to doe what he could possible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing least otherwise all the treasure would be lost: and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to Rome, the would maruelously beawtifie and sette out his triumphe. But Cleopatra would neuer put her selfe into Proculeius handes, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were very thicke & strong, and surely barred, but yet there were some cranewes through the which her voyce might be heard, and so they without vnderstoode, that Cleopatra demanded the kingdome of Egypt for her sonnes: and that Proculeius answered her, that she should be of good cheere, and not be affrayed to referre all vnto Cæsar. After he had viewed the place verie well, he came and reported her answer vnto Cæsar. Vn who immediately sent Gallus to speake once againe with her, and bad him purposely hold her with talke, whilest Proculeius did set vp a ladder against that high windowe, by the which Antonius was trised vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stoode to heare what Gallus sayd vnto her. One of her women which was shut in her monument with her, saw Proculeius by chauce as he came downe, and shrieked out: O, poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when she sawe Proculeius behind her as she came from the gate, she thought to haue stabbed her selfe in with a short dagger she ware of purpose by her side. But Proculeius came sodainly vpon her, and taking her by both the hands, said vnto her. Cleopatra, first thou shalt doe thy selfe great wrong, and secondly vnto Cæsar: to deprive him of the occasion and oportunitie, openly to shew his bountie and mercie, and to geue his enemies cause to accuse the most courteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeache him, as though he were a cruell and merciesse man, that were not to be trusted. So euen as he spake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and shooke her clothes for feare of any poyson hidden about her. Afterwardes Cæsar sent one of his infranchised men called Epaphroditus, whom he straightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any case that she made not her selfe away: and for the rest, to vser her with all the currelfe possible. And for him selfe, he in the meane time entred the citie of Alexandria, and as he went, talked with the Philosopher Arrius, and helde him by the hande, to the end that his contrie men should reuerence him the more, because they saw Cæsar so highly esteeme and honor him. Then he went into the show place of exercises, and so vp to his chaire of state which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commaundement, all the people of Alexandria were assembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercie. Cæsar bad them all stande vp, and told them openly that he forgate the people, and pardoned the felonies and offences they had committed against him in this warre. First, for the founders sake of the same citie, which was Alexander the great: secondly, for the beawtie of the citie, which he much esteemed and wondred at: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his verie frend Arrius. Thus did Cæsar honor Arrius, who craued pardon for him selfe and many others, & specially for Philistratus, the eloquentest man of all the sophisters and Orators of his time, for present and sodaine speech: howbeit he fallily

Cesar vnderstanding this, not for the desire he had to deliuer Philostatus of his feare, as to ridde Arrim of malice & enuy that might haue fallen out against him: he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius sonnes, Anyllus, his eldest sonne by Fulvia was slaine, bicause his schoole-maister Theodorus did betray him vnto the souldiers, who strake of his head. And the villaine tooke a pretious stone of great value from his necke, the which he did sowe in his girdell, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was founde about him, and so Cesar trusted him vp for it. For Cleopatra's children, they were verie honorable kept, with their gouernors and traine that waited on them. But for Cesarion, who was sayd to be Julius Cæsars sonne: his mother Cleopatra had sent him vnto the INDIANS through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great summe of money. But one of his gouernors also called Rhodon, euen such an other as Theodorus, perswaded him to returne into his contrie, & told him that Cesar sent for him to geue him his mothers kingdom. *Cleopatra's

Therefore Cesar did put Cesarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great kings and Captaines did craue Antonius body of Ottavius Cesar, to giue him honorable burial: but Cesar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally burie him with her owne handes, whom Cesar sufficed to take as much as the would to bestow vpon his funerals. Now was the altogether ouercome with sorow & passion of minde, for she had knocked her brest so pitiefully, that she had martired it, and in diuers places had raised vlters and inflammations, so that she fell into a feuer withal: whereof she was very glad, hoping thereby to haue good colour to abstaine from meate, and that so she might haue dyed easily without any trouble. She had a Phisician called Olympus, whom she made priuie of her intent, to the end he should helpe her to ridde her out of her life: as Olympus wryteth him selfe, who wrote a booke of all these thinges. But Cesar mistrusted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, & threatened her to put her children to shameful death. With these threats, Cleopatra for feare yielded straight, as the world haue yielded vnto strokes: and afterwards suffered her selfe to be cured and dieted as they listed. Shortly after, Cesar came him selfe in person to see her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a little low bed in poore estate, when the lawe Cesar came into her chamber, she sodainly rose vp, naked in her smocke, and fell downe at his feete maruelously disfigured: both for that she had plucked her heare from her head, as also for that she had martired all her face with her nailes, and besides, her voyce was small and trembling, her eyes sonke into her heade with continuall blubbering and moreouer, they might see the most parte of her stomake torne in sunder. To be short, her bodie was not much better then her minde: yet her good grace and comelines, and the force of her beawtie was not altogether defaced. But notwithstanding this ougly and pitiefull state of hers, yet she shewed her selfe within, by her outward looks and countenance. When Cesar had made her lye downe againe, and sat by her beddes side: Cleopatra began to cleere and excuse her selfe for that she had done, laying all to the feare she had of Antonius Cesar, in contrarie maner; reproued her in euery poynt. Then she sodainly altered her speache, and prayed him to pardon her, as though she were affrayed to dye, & desirous to liue. At length, she gaue him a breefe and memoriall of all the readie money & treasure she had. But by chaunce there stood Selenus by, one of her Treasurers, who to seeme a good seruant, came straight to Cesar to disproue Cleopatra, that she had not set in al, but kept many things back of purpose. Cleopatra was in such a rage with him, that she flew vpon him, and tooke him by the heare of the head, and boxed him well fauoredly. Cesar fell a laughing, and parted the fray. Alas, said she, O Cesar: is not this a great shame and reproche, that thou hauing vouchsafed to take the peines

As to come vnto me, and haue done me this honor, poore wretche, and caltife creature, brought into this pitiefull & miserable estate: and that mine owne seruantes should come now to accuse me, though it may be I haue refused some iuels & trifles meete for women, but not for me (poore soule) to set out my selfe withall, but meaning to geue some pretie presents & gifts vnto Ottavia and Liuis, that they making meanes & intercession for me to thee, thou mightest yet extend thy fauor and mercie vpon me? Cesar was glad to heare her say so, perswading him selfe thereby that she had yet a desire to saue her life. So he made her answer, that he did not only geue her that to dispose of at her pleasure, which she had kept backe, but further promised to vlt her more honorably and bountifully then she would thinke for: and so he tooke his leaue of her, supposing he had deceiued her, but in deede he was deceiued him selfe. There was a young gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæsars very great familiars, & besides did beare no euil will vnto Cleopatra. He sent her word secretly as she had requested him, that Cesar determined to take his iorney through SVRIA, & that within three dayes he would sende her away before with her children. When this was tolde Cleopatra, she requested Cesar that it would please him to suffer her to offer the last oblations of the dead, vnto the soule of Antonius. This being graunted her, she was caried to the place where his tombe was, & there falling downe on her knees, embracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheekes, she began to speake in this sorte: O my deare Lord ANTONIUS, not long sithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: and now I offer vnto thee the funerall sprinklings and oblations, being a captiue and prisoner, and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing & murdering this captiue body of mine with blowes, which they carefully gard and keepe, onely to triumphe of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honors, offerings, nor sacrifices from me, for these are the last which Cleopatra can geue thee, sith nowe they carie her away. Whilest we liued together, nothing could feuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs change our contries. For as thou being a ROMANA, hast bene buried in ÆGYPT: euen so wretched creature I an ÆGYPTIAN, shall be buried in ITALY, which shall be all the good that I haue receiued by thy contrie. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power and authoritie, sith our gods here haue forsaken vs: suffer not thy true friend and loue to be caried away aliuie, that in me, they triumphe of thee: but receive me with thee, and let me be buried in one selfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miseries be infinite, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could lesse beare withal: then this small time, which I haue bene driue to liue alone without thee. Then hauing ended these dolefull plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands and sundry nosegayes, and maruelous louingly imbraced the fame: she commaunded they should prepare her bath, and when she had bathed and washed her selfe, she fell to her meate, and was sumptuously serued. Nowe whilest she was at dinner, there came a contrieman, and brought her a basket. The souldiers that warded at the gates, asked him straight what he had in his basket. He opened the basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figges, and shewed them that they were figges he brought: They all of them maruelled to see so goodly figges. The contrieman laughed to heare them, and bad them take some if they would. They beleued he told them truly, and so bad him carie them in. After Cleopatra had dined, she sent a certaine table written and sealed vnto Cesar, and commaunded them all to go out of the tombes where she was, but the two women, then she shuted the dores to her. Cesar when he receiued this table, and began to read her lamentation and petition, requesting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, founde straight what the ment, and thought to haue gone thither him selfe: howbeit he sent one before in all hast that might be, to see what it was. Her death was very sodaine. For those whom Cesar sent vnto her ran thither in all hast possible, & found the souldiers standing at the gate, mistrusting nothing, nor vnderstanding of her death. But when they had opened the dores, they founde Cleopatra starke dead, layed vpon a bed of gold, attired and araid in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feete: and her other woman called Charmion halfe dead, and trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra wore vpon her head. One of the souldiers seeing her, angrily sayd vnto her: is that well done Charmion? Verie well sayd she againe, and meete for a Princes descended from the race of so many noble kings. She sayd no more, but fell downe dead hard by the bed. Some report that this Aspicke was brought vnto A her in the basket with figs, & that she had commaunded them to hide it vnder the figge leaues, that when she should thinke to take out the figges, the Aspicke should bite her before she should see her: howbeit, that when she would haue taken away the leaues for the figges, she perceiued it, and said, art thou here then? And so, her arme being naked, she put it to the Aspicke to be bitten. Other say againe, she kept it in a boxe, and that she did prick it and thrust it with a spindell of golde, so that the Aspicke being angered withall, leapt out with great furie, and bitte her in the arme. Howbeit fewe can tell the truth. For they report also, that she had hidden poyson in a hollow raser which she caried in the heare of her head: and yet was there no marke seene of her bodie, or any signe discerned that she was poysoned, neither also did they finde this serpent in her tombe. But it was reported onely, that there were seene certeine fresh steppes or tracks where it had gone, on the tombe side toward the sea, and specially by the dores side. Some say also, that they found two litle pretie bytings in her arme, scant to be discerned: the which it seemeth Cesar him selfe gaue credit vnto, because in his triumph he caried Cleopatras image, with an Aspicke byting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cesar, though he was maruelous sorie for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondered at her noble minde and corage, and therefore commaunded the should be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed also that her two women should haue honorable buriall. Cleopatra dyed being eight and thirtie yeare olde, after she had reigned two and twenty yeeres, and gouerned aboue foureteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, some say that he liued three and fiftie yeares: and others say, six and fiftie. All his statues, images, and metalls, were plucked downe and ouerthrowen, sauing those of Cleopatra which stode still in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her frendes, who gaue Cesar a thousande talentes that they should not be handled, as those of Antonius were. Antonius left seuen children by three wiues, of the which Cesar did put Antyllus, the eldest sonne he had by Fulvia, to death. Octavia his wife tooke all the rest, and brought them vp with hers, and married Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Luba, a maruelous courteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius, the sonne of Fulvia came to be so great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greatest estimation about Cesar, and next vnto the children of Linia, which were the second in estimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octavia hauing had two daughters by her first husband Marcellus, and a sonne also called Marcellus: Cesar married his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and so did adopt him for his sonne. And Octavia also married one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was deade, after he had bene married a while, Octavia perceiving that her brother Cesar was very busie to choose some one among his frends, whom he trusted best to make his sonne in law: she perswaded him, that Agrippa should mary his daughter. (Marcellus widowe) and leaue her owne daughter. Cesar first was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and so she afterwards tooke away her daughter and married her vnto Antonius, and Agrippa married Iulia, Cesars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octavia and Antonius. Domitius Aenobarbus married the one: and the other, which was Antonia, so fayer and vertuous a young Ladie, was married vnto Drusus the sonne of Linia, and sonne in law of Cesar. Of this marriage, came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperour. And of the sonnes of Germanicus, the one whose name was Caius, came also to be Emperour: who, after he had licentiously reigned a time, was slaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina also, hauing a sonne by her first husbande Aenobarbus called Lucius Domitius: was afterwards married vnto Clodius, who adopted her sonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, and slue his owne mother, and had almost destroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madnes and wicked life, being the fift Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF Demetrius with Antonius.

Now, siithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, hauing fortune a like diuers and variable vnto them: let vs therefore come to consider their power and authoritie, and how they came to be so great. First of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance from his father Antigonus: who became the greatest and mightiest Prince of all the successors of Alexander, and had won the most parte of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary maner, borne of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of warre, and had not left him any meane to arise to such greatnes: durst take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cesar, that had no right vnto it by inheritance, but yet made him selfe successor of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obteyned, and by his owne industrie became so great, without the helpe of any other: that the Empire of the whole worlde being deuided into two partes, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greatest countenance and power. Antonius being absent, oftentimes overcame the PARTHIANS in battell by his Lieutenants, and chased away the barbarous people dwelling about mount Caucasus, vnto the sea Hyrcanium: insomuche as the thing they most reprove him for, did most wimes his greatnes. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marrie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although she was too old for him: because she was of a nobler house then him selfe. Antonius on thother side was blamed for marrying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for power and nobilitie of blood, excelled all other kings in her time, but Aspases: and moreover made him selfe so great, that others thought him worthe of greater things, then he him selfe required. Now for the desire that moued the one and the other to conquer realmes: the desire of Demetrius was vnblameable & iust, desiring to raigne ouer people, which had bene gouerned at all times, & desired to be gouerned by kings. But Antonius desire was altogether wicked & tyrannicall: who sought to keepe the people of Rome in bondage and subiection, but lately before rid of Cesars raigne and gouernment. For the greatest and most famous exploit Antonius euer did in waies (to wit, the warre in the which he ouerthrew Cassius and Brutus) was begun to no other ende, but to depriue his contriemen of their libertie and freedom. Demetrius in contrarie maner, before fortune had ouerthrowen him, neuer left to set GRECE at libertie, and to driue the garrisons away, which kept the cities in bondage: and not like Antonius, that boasted he had slaine them that had set Rome at libertie. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius, was his liberallie and bountie: in the which Demetrius excelled him so farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his frends: although he was maruelously well thought of, for the honorable and sumptuous funerals he gaue vnto Brutus bodie. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his enemies be buried that were slaine in battell, and returned vnto Protolmy all the prisoners he had taken, with great giftes and presentes he gaue them. They were both in their prosperitie, verie riotouslie and licentiouslie euens: but yet no man can cuer say, that Demetrius did at any time let slippe any opportunitie or occasion to followe great matters, but onelie gaue him selfe in deede to pleasure, when he had nothing else to doe. And further, to say truly, he tooke pleasure of Lamia, as a man woulde haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing else to doe, or is desirous to sleepe: but in deede when he was to make any preparation for warre, he had not then luey at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came not out of Ladies closets, picked and print to go to battell: but he let all dauncing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith,

The soldier of Mars, cruell, and bloodie.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrowe or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to followe his owne pleasure: as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretlie stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him. Euen so Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and intified him to her, making him lose matters of great importance, and verie needefull iorneyes, to come and be dandled with her, about the riuers of Canobus, and Taphosiris. In the ende, as Paris fledde from the battell, and went to hide him selfe in Helens armes: euen so did he in Cleopatras armes, or to speake more properly, Paris hidde him selfe in Helens closet, but Antonius to followe Cleopatra, fledde and lost the victorie. Furthermore, Demetrius had many wiues that he had married, and all at one time: the which was not disallowable or not forbidden by the kinges of Macedon, but had bene vsed from Philippe and Alexanders time, as also king Lysimachus and Protolmy had, and did honor all them that he married. But Antonius first of all married two wiues together, the which neuer Romane durst doe before, but him selfe. Secondly, he put away his first Romane wife, which he had lawfully married: for the loue of a straunge woman, he fondly fell in fancy with all, and contrarie to the lawes and ordinaunces of Rome. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wiues: but Antonius contrarily was vndone by his wiues. Of all the lasciuious histories Antonius played, none were so abominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogges to come into the castell of Athenes, because of all beastes he is too busie with bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Minerues temple it selfe lay with Curtifans, and there defiled many citizens wiues. And besides all this, the horrible vice of crueltie, which a man would thinke were least mingled with these wanton delights, is ioyned with Demetrius concupiscence: who suffered, (or more properly compelled) the goodliest young boy of Athenes, to dye a most pitiefull death, to saue him selfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurte but to him selfe: and Demetrius did hurte vnto all others. Demetrius neuer hurte any of his frendes: and Antonius suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be slaine, that he might haue his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of it selfe, that he hardlie deserued to haue bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to haue saued his Vncles life. Nowe where they falsified and brake their othes, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander: Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and iustest colour. For Artabazus had betrayed him, and forsaken him in Media. But Demetrius (as diuers doe reporte) deuised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the murder he had committed: and some thinke he did accuse him, to whom he him selfe had done iniurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that woulde doe him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius him selfe did many noble feates in warre, as we haue recited of him before: and contrarily Antonius, when he was not there in petion, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenantes: and they were both ouerthrowen being personallie in battell, but yet not both after one sorte. For the one was forsaken of his men being Macedonians, and the other contrarily forsooke his that were Romans: for he fled, & left them that ventred their liues for his honor. So that the fault the one did was, that he made them his enemies that sought for him: and the fault in the other, that he so beaustlie left them that loued him best, and were most faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man can not praise the one: not

As the other; but yet Demetrius death the more reproachefull. For he suffered him selfe to be taken prisoner, and when he was sent away to be kept in a straunge place, he had the hart to liue yet three yeare longer, to serue his mouth and bellie, as brute beastes doe. Antonius on the other side flue him selfe, (to confesse a troth) cowardly, and miserably, to his great paine and grieve: and yet was it before his bodie came into his enemies hands.

THE LIFE OF Artaxerxes.

Artaxerxes, the first of this name of all the kinges of Persia, a noble and courteous Prince as any of all his house: was surnamed long hand, because his right hand was longer then his left, and he was the sonne of king Xerxes. But the seconde, whose life we presentlie intend to wryte, was surnamed Mnemon, as much to say, great memorie: and he was the sonne of the daughter of the first Artaxerxes. For king Darius, and his wife Parysatis, had foure sonnes: of the which, the eldest was this Artaxerxes, the seconde Cyrus, and two other younger, Ostanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former auncient Cyrus, which in the Persian tongue signifieth the sunne. But Artaxerxes was called before Articus, although Dion wryteth, that he was called Oarfer. Howbeit it is vnlike that Ctesias (although his bookes otherwise be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are founde) should forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he serued, and continuallie followed, both him, his wife, and children. Cyrus from his cradell was of a hotte flurring minde, and Artaxerxes in contrarie manner, more mylde and gentle in all his actions and doinges. He was married to a verie fayer Ladie, by his father and mothers commandement: & afterwards kept her against their wills, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his sonnes wiues brother to death, he woulde also haue put her to death: but her husband with teares made suche humble sute to his mother for her, that with muche a doe, he did not onely gette pardon for her life, but graunt also that she shoulde not be put from him. This notwithstanding, his mother alwayes loued Cyrus better then him, and praised that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his prouinces of ASIA by the sea side, when he was sent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay sicke of the disease he dyed: he went thither in good hope his mother had preuailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of PERSIA. For his mother Parysatis alleged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like case, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Artaxerxes was borne before her husband Darius was king, & Cyrus after he was crowned king. All this could not preuaile. For her eldest sonne Artaxerxes, surnamed Artaxerxes, was assigned king of PERSIA, & Cyrus gouernor of LYDIA, and the kings Lieutenants generall of all the low contries of ASIA toward the sea side. Shortly after king Darius death, the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Pasargades, there to be consecrated and annoynted king, by the Priestes of the contrie of PERSIA. The place of this Pasargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerva the goddesse of battells, as I take it: where the new king must be consecrated, and when he commeth into the temple, he putteth of his gowne, and putteth on that which the old auncient Cyrus ware before he was king. Furthermore, he must eate of a certaine tart or fricacie made of figges with turpentine: and then he must drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are also certaine other secret ceremonies which they must keepe, and none doe know, but the verie Priestes them selues. Now Artaxerxes being readye to enter into all these ceremonies, Tisaphernes came vnto him, & brought him one of the Priestes that had bene Cyrus schoolemaister in his youth, and had taught him magick: who by reason shoulde haue bene more offended then any man else, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cause why they beleued him the better, when he accused Cyrus. For he layd that Cyrus had conspired treason against the king his brothers owne person, & that he ment traitorously to kill him in the temple, when he shoulde put of his gowne. Some doe reporte, that Cyrus was apprehended vpon this simple accusation by word of mouth. Others write also, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding him selfe, he was taken with the manner, and bewrayed by the Priest. So as he was going to suffer death, his mother tooke Cyrus in her armes, and wounde the heare of her heade about his necke, and tyed him straightly to her: and withall she wept so bitterly, and made such pitiefull mone vnto the king her sonne, that through her intercession, the king graunted him his life, & sent him againe into his contrie and gouernment. But this satisfied not Cyrus, neither did he so muche remember the king his brothers fauor vnto him, in granting him his lifes as he did the despite he had offered him, to be made prisoner. Insomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater desire then before to be king. Some wyters alleage, that he entred into actuell rebellion against his brother by force of armes, because he had not sufficient reuenue to defray the ordinary expence of his house: howbeit it is a meere folly to say so. For though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might haue had of her what he would haue taken, and desired. Again, to shew that of him selfe he had abilitie enough: we neede but alleage the fouldiers and straungers he gaue pay vnto, in diuers places, as Xenophon wryteth. For he brought them not all together into one armie, because he desired to kepe his enterprise as secret as he could: but he had frendes and seruants that leauied them in diuers places, and vnder diuers colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleared all suspicions conceiued against him. He him selfe also on the other side, whilst he made these preparations, wrote verie humbly vnto his brother, sometime asking somewhat of him, and an other time accusing Tisaphernes: all to blinde the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and spite against him, besides that the king of his owne nature was somewhat dull, and slow, which the common people thought to proceede of his curtesie and good nature. At his first coming to the crowne, he followed the first Artaxerxes goodnes and curtesie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more easie audience vnto suiters, he did also more honorably reward & recompence those that had deserued well: & he vsed such moderation in punishing of offenders, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious minde and desire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurte any man. Vvhen he had any thing geuen him, he tooke it as thankfully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankly also geue againe. For, how litle a thing foucer was offered him, he tooke it well. And it is reported that one Romisus on a time presented him

A maruelous fayer pomegranet. By the sunne sayd he, this man in a short time of a litle towne would make a great citie, he that would make him gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore laborer seing euery ma giue the king a present, some one thing, some another as he passed by them: he hauing nothing at hand to giue him, ranne to the riuers side, & tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offered it him. King Artaxerxes was so glad of it, that he sent him in a cuppe of massy gold, a thousand Darecks, which were peeces of gold so named, because the image of Darius was stamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDÆMONIAN, that presumed to giue him bold words, it pleased him to answer him by one of his Captaines: thou mayst say what thou lyst, and I as king, may say and doe what I lyst. Another time as he was a hunting, Tiribazus shewed the king his gowne that was all tattered: well, sayd the king, and what wouldst thou haue me to doe? Tiribazus answered him, I praye your grace take another, and giue me that you haue on. The king did so, and told him: Tiribazus, giue thee my gowne, but I commaund thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commaundement that he shoulde not weare it, nor that he was any euill disposed man, but because he was a fond light headed fellowe that cared for nothing: thereupon he straight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did besides set on many iewells of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinkets and ornaments. Therewithall euery man in the Court murmured at him, because it was a presumption, directly against the lawes and ordinaunces of PERSIA. Howbeit the king did but laugh at it, & tolde him: I giue thee leave Tiribazus to weare those womens gawdes as a woman, and the kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the manner was in PERSIA that no person sate at the kings bord, but his mother and wife, of the which, his mother sate vppermost, & his wife lowermost: Artaxerxes made his two brethren Ossanes and Oxathres sit at his owne bord. But yet he pleased the PERSIANS best of all, because he was content his wife Statyra should sit openly in her charret, and that she might be seene and reuerenced by the other Ladies of the contrie. And this made him singularly beloued of the people. Now, such as desired innouation and change, and that could not away with quiet life: they gaue out that the Realme of PERSIA required such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberrall of nature, giuen to armes, & greatly rewarded his seruants, and that the greatnes of the Empire of PERSIA stood in neede of a king, whose mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereupon began to make warre vpon his brother, not onely trusting vnto them that were of the lowe contries about him, but hoping of those also in the high prouinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore he wrote also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, to pray them to send him men of warre, promising to giue the footemen they sent, horses: and the horsemen, coches: landed men, whole villages: and to those that had villages, to giue them cities. Besides all this, that for the ordinary wages of them that should serue him in this warre, he would not pay them by accompt, but by full measure: and boasting largely of him selfe, he sayd he had a greater mind then his brother, that he could better away with hardnes then he, that he vnderstoode magick better then he, and that he could drinke more wine then he, and eary it better. And that the king his brother in contrary manner was so womanlike and fearful, that when he went a hunting, he durst scarce get vp vpon his horse backe: and when he went to the warres, he would hardly take his charriot. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had red his letters, they sent a litle scrowle vnto Clearchus, commanding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would commaund him. So Cyrus did set forward to make warre against his brother, hauing leauied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRÆCIANS, litle lesse then thirteene thousand men: sometime aduertising one cause, sometime another, why he leauied such a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long dissembled: for Tisaphernes went him selfe vnto the Court, to bringe newes of his attempt. Then all the Court was straight in an vprore withall. Many men also did accuse the Queene mother, for the practise of this warre, & all her friends & seruants were vehemently suspected to be conspirators with Cyrus: but the greatest thing that troubled Parysatis most, was Queene Statyra her Daughter in lawe, who stormed maruelously to see this warre begon against king Artaxerxes her husband, and incessantly cryed out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedst by othe? whereto are thy intercessions come thou madeſt, for the pardon of his life: who now conſpyreth his brothers death? By ſaying of his A life, art not thou now the cauſe of this warre and troubles we ſee at hand? After this reproch and ſhame receiued by Statira, Parſiſis, being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, ſo hated her, that from thenceforth he fought all the wayes ſhe could to put her to death. And Dion the Hiſtoriographer ſayth, that during this warre, ſhe did execute her wicked purpoſe vpon her: but Cteſias writeth, that it was after the warre. And therefore it is liker, that he being daily in the king of PERSIAES Court, ſhould certainly knowe the tyme when ſhe did execute her treaſon againſt her, and alſo there is no cauſe why he ſhould rather write it in any other time, then in that in the which the ſaſe was done: although in many other places he commonly vſeth to ſiten, and to write deuifes of his owne head. Therefore let vs leaue the report of this faſt to the ſelfe ſame time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare B vnto his brothers contry, he had newes, and a rumor ranne through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him ſo ſoone: and that he ment firſt to goe further into PERSIA, and to tary there til he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for prooſe hereof, the king hauing caſt a great trenche of ten yardes broad, and as many high, the ſpace of ſoure hundred furlong in length: he left it without gard, and let Cyrus winne it, who came on further without any reſiſtance, euen to the very citie ſelfe of BABYLON. Howbeit in the ende, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the fiſt man that durſt tell the king, that he ſhould not flie fight in that ſort, nor hide him ſelfe in the furdeſt part of PERSIA, leauing his enemy the Realmes of MEDIA, BABYLON, and SUSA: conſidering alſo that he had many moe ſouldiers in readines then his enemy, and an infinite number of Captaines more ſkilfull, and G abler to giue counſell, and to fight, then he was. Theſe words of Tiribazus made the king alter his mind, and to determine to giue battell as ſoone as he could. Thereupon he marched forward againſt his enemy, with nyne hundred thouſand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruclouſly aſtonied Cyrus men, and made them aſ- frayd at the firſt, when they ſaw them in ſo excellently good order before them: for that they were diſperſed ſtragling here and there without any order, and men vnarmed, truſting too much in them ſelues, in deſpiſing of their enemy: ſo that Cyrus had much a doe to let his men in battell raze, and yet was it with great noyſe and tumult. But the GRECIANS wondred moſt of all other, when they ſawe the kinges armye march in ſo good order of battell without any noyſe. For they thought to haue ſeene a wonderfull great diſorder and conſuſion, in ſuch D an infinite multitude of people: and ſuppoſed they would haue made ſuch a noyſe, that one of them (ſhould not haue heard another). Where in deede to the contrary, all was ſo well maſſhal, ſpecially becauſe he had placed before his battell the beſt carts he had armed with ſiethes, and drawn with the ſtrongeſt and biggeſt great horſe he had in all his armie: hoping by the fierceness and furey of their careere, to brake into the ranckes of the enemies, before they could come to ioyne with theirs. But ſith this battell is deſcribed by diuers Hiſtoriographers, but ſpecially by Xenophon, who hath (as a man would ſay) liuely ſet it out to the eye, & ſeteth it forth to the Reader, not as a battell already fought, but preſently a fighting, ſtirring vp their mindes as if them ſelues were in the action and inſtant danger, he hath ſo paſſingly ſet it downe: it were but a folly therefore of me to rake vpon me to make any further deſcription of it, ſauing to touch ſome ſpeciall point worthy of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As, the place where the battell was fought, is called COYNAXA, ſiue hundred furlongs from BABYLON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counſell to keepe behind the Squadron of the GRECIANS; and not to hazard his perſon among the fiſt: and that Cyrus answered him, what ſayeſt thou Clearchus? wouldſt thou haue me that ſtrives to be king, to ſhew my ſelfe vnworthy to be a king? But Cyrus hauing made this fault, not ſtanding vpon his ſafetie and garde, but ouer raſhly thruſting him ſelfe into great danger: Clearchus ſelfe alſo committed as great a fault (if it were not worſe) when he would not let his men in order directly againſt the battell of the enemies, where the kings perſon ſtoode, but went and pent them vp by the riuers ſide, being affrayd leaſt they ſhould haue bene compaſſed in behind. For if he would haue looked ſo ſtraightly to him ſelfe, and haue prouided euery way for his ſafetie, that no man might come to hurt him: he ſhould haue kept him ſelfe at home, and not

A not haue ſtirred one ſoote out of the dores. But ſith he had comen ſo farre, as from the low contries of ASIA, vnto the place where the field was fought, and vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers ſeate & imperiall crowne, to goe chooſe a place in the battell, not where he might doe his Lord beſt ſeruiſe that had hyered him, but rather where he might fight more at his eaſe, and at leſſe danger: it was euen as much, as if through cowardlines his wits had bene taken from him when he ſhould haue fought, or that through treaſon he had forſaken his enterpriſe. For, to proue that the trowpes which were about the kinges perſon, had neuer bene able to haue receiued the charge of the GRECIANS, and that thoſe being ouerthrowen, the king had bene ſlayne in the field, or els forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victorie had bene king: the ſucceſſe of this battell doth plainly B ſhewe it. And therefore Clearchus ouer curious reſpect, deſerued more blame for the loſſe of this battell: then Cyrus ouerhardines. For if king Artaxerxes would haue choſen or wiſhed a place where the GRECIANS might haue done him leſſe hurt: he could not haue deuifed a ſitter place that was ſo farre from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither ſee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in ſequell. For Cyrus was ſlayne before he could preuaile by Clearchus victorie, he was ſo farre from him: and furthermore, Cyrus there in knew before what was meeteſt to be done. For he commaunded Clearchus to place him ſelfe with his company in the middeſt of the battell: who answered him, he ſhould take no thought for nothing, for he would ſee all things well ordered. And when he had ſayd ſo, he marred all afterwarde: For where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrew the barbarous C people that made head againſt them, & had thẽ in chaſe while they were weary of following of them. Cyrus being mounted vpon a whoſe ſtirring horſe, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Pafacas, as Cteſias writeth: Artagerſes, the gouernor of the province of the CADYSIANS, ſpyed him a farre off, and when he had found him, clapped ſpurs to his horſe, and came with full carriere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and moſt vnfaithfull and deſperate man, thou now diſhonoreſt the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieſt and moſt honorableſt name of all the PERSIANS) for that thou haſt brought ſo valliant GRECIANS hether to ſo wicked an enterpriſe, to ſpoyle the PERSIANS goods, in hope to deſtroy thy ſoueraigne Lord and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of ſlaues and ſeruantes ſaſe honeſter men then thou wilt be while thou liueſt, and that thou ſhalt preſently knowe by D prooſe, for thou ſhalt dye before thou ſee the king thy brothers face: and therewithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus armor was ſo good, that it pearſed him not: yet the blowe came with ſuch good will, that it made him ſtagger on his horſe back. When Artagerſes had giuen him that blowe, he preſently turned his horſe. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him ſo happily, that he flue him right in the place about the bone that ioyneth the two ſhoulders together: ſo that the head of his dart, ranne quite through his necke. Nowe, that Cyrus ſawe Artagerſes with his owne hands in the field, all the Hiſtoriographers doe agree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, becauſe Xenophon toucheth it but a litle by the way, for that he was not preſent in the very place where he was ſlayne: it ſhal not be hurtfull particularly to ſet downe the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dion, and E alſo of Cteſias. Firſt, Dion writeth, that after Cyrus had ſlayne Artagerſes, he went with great fury, and flue in amongſt the trowpe of them which were neareſt vnto the kinges perſon, and that he came ſo neare the king, that he flue his horſe ſtarke dead vnder him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, ſtraight mounted the king againe vpon another horſe, and ſayd vnto him: your grace will remember this battell another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping ſpurs againe to his horſe, threw an other dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king tolde them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather dye then ſuffer it: ſo therewithall he ſpur- ring his horſe to charge Cyrus, (who came fiercely and deſperately, hauing an infinite number of blowes with darts thrown at him on euery ſide) threw his dart at him alſo. So did all thoſe F that were about his perſon: and ſo was Cyrus ſlayne in this conſlict. Some ſaye, that he was ſlayne with the wounde the kinge his brother gaue him. Others ſaye, that it was a man at armes of the contry of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good ſeruiſe, gaue him the honor in all battels to cary before the first ranke, a cocke of gold on the toppe of a speare. A for the PERSIANS doe call the CARIANS cocks, because in the warres they vse to weare crests in the toppe of their headpieces. And this is Dionys reporte. But Ctesias, to cowche in fewe words that which Dionys reporteth at large, sayth: that Cyrus after he had slaine Artaxerxes, he gallopped on the spurres against the king him selfe, and the king against him, and not a worde betweene them both. Ariamus, one of Cyrus flatterers, threwe the first dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threwe his dart, thinking to haue hit Cyrus, but he missed him, and slue Tisaphernes, one of the valliantest and stoutest men Cyrus had about him, and so fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes so fore a blowe on his breast, that he peared his armor, and entred into his flesh two fingers deepe. The king with this blowe fell downe to the ground: wherewithall the most part of his men about him were so affrayd, that they forooke him, and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were a- bout him, amongst whome Ctesias sayd he was one: and so recovered a litle hill not farre of, to take a litle breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horse that was whorke in the mouth, and hard headed as we haue told you: caried his master spyte of his hart farre from his men, amongst his enemies, and no man knew him, because it was night, and his men were very buisie in seeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had wonne the victory, being of a whorke stirring nature, and valliant: he went vppe and downe in the thickest of his enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN tongue, saue your selues poore men, saue your selues. When they heard him say so, some made a lane for him to passe by them, and did him reuerence: But by euill fortune his Tiara (which is the highe royall hat after the PERSIAN manner) fell off of his head. Then a younge PERSIAN called Mithridates, passing by him, hit him a blowe with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His wound straight fell of a marvelous bleeding. Whereuppon, Cyrus staggering at it, fell to the ground in a fownd, and his horse ranne away from him: but the caparison he had vpon him fell to the ground all blouided, and his page that had hurt him, took it vp. Shortly after, Cyrus being come to him selfe againe, some of his Euenukes (which were men gell, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to set him vpon another horse, and to get him out of the prease: but he was not able to sit on his horse. Thereuppon he proued if he could better goe a foote, & the Euenukes held him vp by the armes, & led him amazed as he was, not able to stand on his feete, although he thought he had won the battell: because he heard his enemies flying. D about him cry, the gods saue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receive them to mercy. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the citie of CAVNVS, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and slaues, to doe most vile seruice. They ioined with the troupe where Cyrus was, supposing they had bene the kings men: but when they perceiued in the ende by the red coates they were vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men wear white coates: there was one among the rest that valliantly strake at Cyrus behind with his pertsan, not knowing in deece that it was Cyrus. The blowe lighted full on the hamme of his legge and cut his sinewes so, that Cyrus fell withall, and falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great stone with his browe, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Ctesias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth E his throate with a dull edged knife, he hath such a doe to bring Cyrus to his ende. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artaxerxes, one of king Artaxerxes Euenukes, whome they called the kings eye in the Court: passing by a horsebacke, knewe Cyrus Euenukes that mourned very pitifully lamenting the death of their master. So he asked the Euenuke whome Cyrus loued best: who is that that is dead. O Parisacas, that thou weepest so bitterly? Parisacas answered him againe, seest thou not Artaxerxes, that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artaxerxes wondered much when he sawe him. So he comforted the Euenuke, and willed him in no case to goe from the body: and in the meane time he gallopped a pace to the king, who thought he had lost all, and was very ill besides, both for the great thirst he suffred, as also for his wound he had on his breast. F when the Euenuke came vnto the king, & told him with a smyling countenance the newes, how he had seene Cyrus dead: The king was so ioyfull at the newes, that he was desirous him selfe forthwith to goe vnto the place where he lay to see him, and commanded Artaxerxes to bringe

A bring him thither. But after he had considered better of it, he was counsell'd not to goe thither him selfe for feare of the GREGIANS, who they sayd wonne all, and were yet chafing at killing them in the field, that fled. But rather that he should send a good company of men thither, to bring him iust report, whether the newes were true of his death or not. Vpon this his wife he stayed, and sent thither thirty men, euery man with torches in their hands: In the meane tyme, one of his Euenukes called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downe to see if he could get any water for the king, that was almost dead for thirst: for there was no water about him where he was, and besides, his campe was farre from him. His Euenuke hauing sought out and downe a great way to seeke it, mette by chance with these poore slaues and porters the CAVNIANS, amongst the which one of them caried in an olde ragged gotteskinne, a skindeight glassfulls of naughty stinking water. So he presently caried the same to the king, who dranke it vp euery whit. When the king had dranke it, the Euenuke asked him, if his drinke hurt him no hurt. The king swaie by the goddesses vnto him, that he neuer dranke any water, nor sweeter water: then that was, nor that pleased him better than that which he dranke therefore, sayde he, I beseeche the goddesses if it be not my happe, to finde him that brought this water to reward him, yet that it will please them to fend him good fortune. And the king was talking thus with his Euenuke, the thirty men with their torches returned vnto him, and altogether with ioyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes: he looked not for it. And then there were come together againe a great number ofouldiers about him, and still came more one after another, that he beganne againe to be coragious. Then he came downe into the playne, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went straight to the place where his brother Cyrus body lay. There, following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS against their tors to the king: he caufed his head and right hand to be stricken off, and then made his head be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the beares of his head (for Cyrus had a head long and thicke) and did him selfe shew it vnto them that fled still, and reuerendly to reuerence them againe. They wondering to see it, did him humble reuerence, and so gathered by companies about the king, that in a smal time there were gathered together about him, threescore and tenne thousand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards his campe. In deece Ctesias sayth, that he had but foure hundred thousand fighting men in all but Dionys and Xenophon say more. And for the number of them that were slaine, Ctesias sayth that D was brought to the king, that there were not aboue nyne thousand slaine, howbeit that to fight they seemed to be no lesse then twenty thousand. But for that point he might be talked withall, in either of both. But furthermore, where he sayth that the king did fend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GREGIANS, and others with him: that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Ctesias wayed vpon the king, because he speaketh of him in diuers places of his historie: and if he had bene appoynted by the king to cary report vnto the GREGIANS of so waigthy a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not haue concealed it when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Ctesias (as it appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, and partiall vnto the LACEDEMONIANS, but specially vnto Clearchus. He is glad when he can get any occasion to speake of him selfe for his glory. Of LACEDEMONIANS E of Clearchus. Now after this battell, king Artaxerxes sent goodly riches gifts vnto Artaxerxes sonne, whose father Cyrus had slaine with his owne hands, and as it is reported, did also greatly honor Ctesias and many others: and did not forget also to cause the poore CAVNIANS to be fought out, that had giuen him the water to be caried to him which saved his life, and when he had found him out of a poore wretch unknowne before, he made him a rich man. He severely punished those also that had offended the martiall law, as amongst others Arbares, one of the MEDITERRANEANS: who when the battell was ioyned, he fled first, and then when he vnderstoode he was slaine, he returned againe to the kings side. For supposing that it was rather timorousnes and cowardly nature, then for treason or trait will he beare him, he compelled him to carye a whore on his backe starke naked, all daye long about the market place. And to another, who besides he had yielded him selfe to his enemies, falsely hee had that he had slaine two: he made his tongue to be bored thorough in three severall places with a cordiners alle. Now the king being of opinion that it was him selfe that had slaine his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being desirous that euery man should so thinke & saye he sent presents vnto Mithridates, that had hurt him first in the forehead, and commaunded him that caried the giftes vnto him, to tell him from the king: the king doth send thee these presents, because thou finding first the capparison of Cyrus horse, diddest bring it vnto the king: The Carian also that had cut the hamme of his legges wherewith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewise: the which the king gaue him, and bad the Messenger tell him, the king doth giue thee this, because thou wast the second person that broughtest him the good newes. For Artaxerxes was the first, and thou the second, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleased in his mind with those wordes, he went his way, and sayd nothing then; nor made any thing a doe: but the vnfortunate Carian fondely fell into a foolish vaine, common vnto men. For, the sodaine ioy he felt (as it seemeth) to see such a goodly rich present before him, as the king sent him: made him to forget him selfe, that he began to aspyre, and to pretend greater things, then became his state and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings giftes, as in respect that he had brought him worde of Cyrus death: but began to storme, and to rage, calling the gods to witness, that it was he onely, and none other, that slue Cyrus, and that they did him great wronge, to take this honor from him. The king being told of it, tooke it so angrily: that he presently commaunded them to strike off his head. But Parysatis (the Queene mother) being present when the king gaue this commaundement, she prayed him not to put him to death in that sort: for the Villain, sayd she, let me alone, I will chastise him well enough for his presumption and rash speeche. The king was contented (he should haue him). Thereupon she sent the Sergeants to take this cursed Carian, and made him be hanged vpon a gibbet ten dayes together, and at the tenne dayes end caused his eyes to be pulled out of his head, and last of all, poored molten mettell into his eares; and so killed the Villaine with this kinde of torment. Mithridates also shortly after, died miserably, by a like follye. He was bidden to supper at a feast, whether came also the king and Cyrus mother Euenukes: and when they came, Mithridates fate downe at the bord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had supped, and that they beganne to drinke one to another, one of Parysatis Euenukes sayd vnto Mithridates: the king hath in deede giuen thee a goodly gowne, Mithridates, and goodly chaynes and carcanets of gold, and so is the sword very rich and good he gaue thee, so that when thou hast that by thy side, there is no man I warrant thee but will thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates then, the wine fuming into his brayne, answered straight: what meanest thou by that, Sparamixes? I deserued a better then this, when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, answered, I do not speak it for any hurt or euil will I beare thee, Mithridates: but to speake frankly among our felues, because the Grecians haue a common prouerbe, that wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valliant acte was it to take vp a capparison of a horse that fell on the ground, and to carry it to the king? which the Euenuke spitefully put forth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to speake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a hasty man of nature, & could not kepe his tongue, & least of all when he had dronke so wel as he had done, and so it fell out in deede. For Mithridates could not byte it in, but replied straight: you may talke as long as you lyst of the capparison of a horse, & such trash, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was slayne with myne owne hands, and with no mans els. For I hit him not in vaine as Artageres did, but full in the forehead hard by his eye, and strake him through and through his head againe, and so ouerthrew him, of which blow he dyed. He had no sooner spoken those words, but the rest that were at the bord, cast down their eyes, foreseeing the death of this pore & vnfortunat Mithridates. But then the master of the feast began to speake, and sayd vnto him: friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drinke and be mery, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king, and for the rest, let this talke goe, it is too highe for vs. When the Euenuke went from thence, he tolde Parysatis the Queene mother what Mithridates had sayd before them all: and she went and tolde the king of it. Who was maruelously offended withall to be so belyed, and to lose the thing that was most honorable, and best pleased him in his victorie. For it was his mind, that all the world (both Grecians and barbarous people) should certainly beleue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt

A hurt, but yet that he slue Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king commaunded that Mithridates should suffer the paines of death in botes, the which is after this manner. They take two botes made of purpose so euery, that the one is neither broder nor longer then the other, & then lay the offender in one of the vpon his back, & so couer him with the other, & do so wth both botes together: So that the parties feete, hands, & head do come out at holes made of purpose for him, the rest of his bodye is all hidden within. Now they giue him meate as much as he will eate, & if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thrusting alles in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they giue him hony to drinke mingled with milke, & they do not only powre it into his mouth, but also all his face ouer, turning him full into the sunne, so that his face is all couered ouer with flies: & furthermore, being driuen to do his needes in that trougle, of his excrements there ingender wormes that eate his bodye euē to the very priuities. Then, when they see the man is dead, they take of the vppermost boate, & find all his flesh deuoured with vermine ingendering of him, euē to his very intrals. So, when Mithridates had miserably languished in this manner, seuentene daies together: at length he died in extreme torment. Now Parysatis (the Queene mother) lacked no more to accomplish her wicked desire, but Mefabates, one of the kings Euenukes that had cut of Cyrus head and hand: & being that he was very ware & circumspect in his behauior, that she could not take him at any aduantage: in the end she deuised a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruelous wit, & amonge other things could play passingly wel at all games at dyce, & did many times play with the king her sonne before the warres: & after the warres also, when he had made peace, she did play at dyce with him as she had done before, inso much as she knew all his secret loue, and furthered him to enioy it. To be short, she would neuer be out of his sight but as little as she could, & would let his wife Statira haue as litle time with him as might be, that she might gouerne and rule him as she would: both because she hated her of all creatures liuing, and also for that she would beare the greatest sway and credit about him. When she saw the king one day at leysure, not knowing how to passe the time away: she incited him to play a throwfand Darecks at dyce, and was contented to lose them willingly, and paid the thousand Darecks downe, seeming notwithstanding to be angry with her losse. So she prayed him also to play one of his Euenukes with her: & the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betwene the that they should both name & except sue of the trustiest & chiefeft Euenukes they had: & then, which of them lost, should presently deliuer vnto the winner his choyce of all the other Euenukes he would demand. Thus they fel to play, & she employing all the cunning she had, & playing as warily as she could possible, besides that the dyce ranne of her side, her luck serued her so, that she wanne: & then she required Mefabates for her winnings, being none of those the king had excepted. Whē she had him deliuered her, she gaue him to the hangmen, & willed the to flea him aliue, & then that they should crucifie him, & naile him to a crosse, & hang his skin vpon an other peece of tymber by him: the which was done accordingly. The king was maruelous angry withall when he knew it, & greenously offended with his mother. Howbeit she sported it out, & laughing, told him in deed it becomes thee wel to be angry for losing an old gelded Villain, where I lost a thousand Darecks quietly, & said neuer a word. So there came no other thing of it, sauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had plaid so fondly & was so finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other side, besides that she was against her in al other things: she spared not to tel Queene mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kings good & faithful seruants so cruelly to death, for Cyrus sake. But now, after that Tisaphernes (king Artaxerxes Lieutenant) had decieued Clearchus, & other captaines of Grecs, detestably falsifying his word he had giuen the, & that he had sent them bound vnto the king: Ctesius sayth, that Clearchus praied him to helpe him to a combe, & that hauing had one by his meanes, and also comed his head, it pleased him so wel, that to requite his good wil, he gaue him his scale of armes from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, for a witness of the great friendship that was betwene them two. He sayth also that in the stone of this ring there was grauen the daunce of the Caryatides. And furthermore, that the other soldiers which were prisoners with Clearchus, did take away the moste part of the vittells that were sent to him, and left him litle or nothing: and that he did remedye all this, procuring a greater quantitie to be sent vnto them, & that they should put Clearchus portion A apart, and all the other souldiers part also by them selues. This he did, as he sayth, by Parysatis consent & commaundement, who knowing that amongst other vittells they daily sent Clearchus a gammon of bacon: he tolde him one day he should doe well to hide a litle knife in this gammon of bacon, and to send it him, to tend that the life of so noble & valliant a man as he was, should not fall to the crueltie of the king. Howbeit, that he was affrayd to meddle withall, and durst not doe it: & that the king sware, & promised his mother, (who was an earnest suter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithstanding, the king being afterwards procured, & perfwaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his wife: he put them all to death, but Menon. Therefore Parysatis, Queene mother, after that time (sayth Ctesias) deuised all the wayes she could to poyson Queene Statira, and to make B her out of the way. But me thinketh this smelleth like a lye, that Parysatis should entend so wicked and daungerous an acte, as to put the kinges lawfull wife to death, by whome he had sonnes that were to inherite the crowne, onely for the loue and respect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coynd that, to honor and magnifie Clearchus memorie the more. But to proue it, a man may easily find it by the lyes he addeeth afterwards vnto it: saying, that after the Captaines were slayne, all the bodies of the rest were torne a peeces by dogges & fowles: and also that there came a boysterous winde, and covered all Clearchus body with a great hill of dust, and that out of this hill of dust shortly after there spronge vp many palme trees, which made a pretie thicke groue, that it shadowed all that place. In somuch that the king him selfe did afterwards maruelously repent him for putting of him to death, for that he was an honest C man, & beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus sake, but for an olde canckered malice Parysatis had long time borne in her hart against Queene Statira: because the saw wel enough, that the credit & authoritie her self had with the king, was in respect of a sonnes duty & obediēce to his mother, & in contrary maner, Statiraes credit & authoritie had a better ground & foundacio, because it came of the loue & good will the king did beare her. And this is the onely cause that made her to practise the death of Queene Statira, hauing determined that her self, or daughter in law, must nedes dye. Now Queene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credit about her, & whom she onely trusted. Dionon writeth, that this Gigis did help Parysatis to make the poyson. But Ctesias writeth contrarily, & saith that the onely knew it, but otherwise that it was against her will: & that he that made the poyson, was D one Belitaras, but Dionon calleth him Melantas. Now, though in outward semblance and shew Queene mother & Statira seemed to haue forgotte all malice betwene them, & that they began again one of them to keepe company with the other, & did eate & drinke together: yet one of them mistrusted the other, & tooke great heede to them selues, both of them eating one selfe meate, & in one dishe together, and were both serued with one self officers & men. In PERSIA there is a litle bird, of the which all the parts of it is excellent good to eate, & is full of fat with in: so that it is thought it liueth by ayer & dewe, and in the PERSIAN tongue they call it Ryntaces. Parysatis, as Ctesias sayth, tooke one of these birdes, and cut it in the middelt with a litle knife, the which was poysoned onely on one of the sides, and gaue that halfe which was poysoned vnto Statira. Yet Dionon writeth, that it was not Parysatis her selfe that gaue it her, but her E caruer Melantas, that carued her meate, & still gaue Queene Statira of that meate which the side of his poisoned knife had touched. So Queene Statira presely fel sick of the discale where of the died, with greuous panges & gripings in her bowels, & found plainly that the was poysoned by Parysatis meanes: whereuppon she tolde the king as much, who was of the same opinion, & thought it was his mother, because he knew her cruel reueging mind, that neuer pardoned any, against who she conceiued any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers household seruants & officers, & did put them to torments, to make them confesse the troth, faining Gigis, whom Queene mother kept close in her chamber a long time, & would neuer suffer the king to haue her: who earnestly requested her to deliuer her vnto him. Notwithstanding, Gigis her selfe at length prayed Queene mother to giue her leaue one night to go home to her house. The king vnderstanding it, layed waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when she was taken, he condemned ned her to suffer the paynes of death ordeyned for poysoners, the which in PERSIA is executed in this manner. They make them put their head vpon a great plaine stone, and with an other stone they presse and struke it so long, till they haue dashed the braynes of the malefactor out of their head. After this sort was Gigis put to death. Now for Parysatis his mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor sayd no more vnto her, but confined her vnto BABYLON according to her desire, & sware, that whilest she liued, he would neuer see BABYLON. In this state floode the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes hauing done the utmost he could to haue ouer-comen the GRÆCIANS which came to make warre with him in the hart of his Realme, and would haue bene as glad of that, as he was to haue overcome Cyrus, & to keepe his crowne & Realme: he could neuer preuaile against them. For though they had lost Cyrus that gaue them B entertainment, & all their priuate Captaines that led them: they saued them selues notwithstanding, being in the hart of his Realme, and shewed the PERSIANS by experience, that all their doings was nothing but gold & siluer, curiositie, & fayer women, & otherwise, nothing but pompe & vanity. Hereuppon all the GRÆCIANS became couragious, & despised the barbarous people: in somuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great shame & dishonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRÆCIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the slavery & bō-dage of the PERSIANS, & kept them from the open violence & cruelty of the barbarous people.

For they hauing at other times attempted to doe it by their Capitaine Thimbron, & afterwards also by Dercylidas, whom they senthither with an army, & hauing done nothing worthy memory: at length they determined to send their king Agessilas thither in person, who passing through ASIA with his shippes, began presently to make hot warre against the PERSIANS C as soone as euer he had landed his army. For, at the first cōflict he ouerthrew Tisaphernes (the king of PERSIANS Lieutenante) in battell, and made the most part of the cities of GRECE that are in ASIA, to rebel against him. Artaxerxes looking into this warre, & wisely considering what way & meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GRÆCIANS: he sent into GRECE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN, (of great credit about him) with a maruelous summe of gold & siluer, bountifully to bestow in gifts among the nobilitie & chiefe rulers of the cities of GRECE, to make all the other GRÆCIANS to rise against the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wisely executed his cōmission, for he made the chiefe cities of GRECE to rebel against LACEDÆMON: so that all BELOPONNESVS being vp in armes, and in great garboyle, the Ephoroi at LACEDÆMON D were enforced to send for Agessilas home again. Agessilas being fory to depart out of ASIA, said vnto his friends: that the king of PERSIA had driuen him out of his Realme with thirty thousand archers: because that the PERSIAN coyne is staped with an archer, hauing a bow in his hand. Artaxerxes also draue the LACEDÆMONIANS out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by the meanes of Conon, general of the ATHENIANS, who Pharnabazus (one of his Lieutenants) had wonne to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrowen in battell at a place called the goates riuer, kept euer after in the Ile of CYPRVS, not so much for the safetie of his person, as also for that it was a mere place to stay in, vntill the wars of GRECE were appeased. He knowing that the deuise he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution, & on the contrary fide, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe iudgement to be employed: he wrote letters vnto him of his deuise what he thought to doe, straightly charging him whom he deliue-red his letters vnto, that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be deliuered vnto the king by Xenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dauncers, or by one Polycritus his Phisition, born in the city of MENDIS: & in both their absences, then to giue it vnto Ctesias, to deliuer vnto the king. It chaunced so that this letter came to the hands of Ctesias: who, as it is reported, added moreouer vnto the cōtents of the letter, that the king should send him vnto Conon, because he was a necessary man to be employed in his seruice, but specially by sea. Ctesias sayth not so, but writeth that the king of his owne voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon & Pharnabazus, won the battell by sea neare the Ile of GNIIDS, & that thereby he had driuen all the LACEDÆMONIANS from their iurisdiction by F sea, all GRECE had him in maruelous great estimation: so that he gaue vnto the GRÆCIANS with such cōditions as he would, that so famous peace, called Antalcidas peace. This *Antalcicured by the treatie of this peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left vnto Artaxerxes all the cities of GREECE IN ASIA, & all the Illes contained in the same, to enioy quietly making the pay tribute at his pleasure. This peace being cōcluded with the GREECIANS (if so to shamefull a treason, reproch, & common infamy to all GREECE may be called a peace, as neuer warre sell out more dishonorable & infamous for the vanquished) king Artaxerxes that otherwife hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, & that esteemed the (as Dion writeth) the impudentest men liuing: did notwithstanding loue Amalcidas passingly wel, & entertained him very honorably, when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, & did wet it with the most precious & sweetest oyle of perfume that was prepared for the feast, & set the same vnto Amalcidas in so much as euery mā marvelled to see the king for so much by him. In deed he was a mete man to follow the vanity & curiositie of the PERSIANS, & & had wel deserved such a garland to be sent him: who was so bold to daunce a daunce before the PERSIANS, mocking & counterfeiting Leonidas & Callicratides, two of the valliantest men that euer were in GREECE. Therefore one said at that time in the presence of king Agessilus: O how vnhappy is poore GREECE at this day, when the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agessilus presently answered him againe, not so, said he: but rather the PERSI-ANS followe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithstanding, this wise aunswer Agessilus made, did not take away the shame of the fact: & shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS lost the battell of LEVCTRES, & therewith all the signiorie & principalltie they had kept of long time ouer all GREECE, although they had lost their estimatiō before, for consenting to so shamefull & dishonorable a peace. Whe SPARTA florished most, & was chiefe of all the other cities of GREECE so long did Artaxerxes stil cōtinue to make much of Amalcidas, & called him his frie. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had lost the battell of LEVCTRES, hauing receiued to great an ouerthrow, & wanting money: they sent Agessilus into EGYPT, & Amalcidas into PERSIA vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to ayde and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit the king made to final accompt of him, & disdaind him so much, denying him, & his requests: that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there also seeing that his enemies mocked him, & fearing that the Ephori would cō-mit him to prison: he killed him self with famine. About that time also, the THEBANS after they had won the battell of LEVCTRES, sent Ismenias & Pelopidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes: where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of him self. Howbeit Ismenias being commaunded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ringe at his feete, and stowped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of some that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking a secret aduertisement very wel sent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN: he gaue him ten thousand daricks by his Secretary called Belluris. And because he had a sickly body, & was driue to drinke cows milke to restore him: the king therfore sent foure score mylche kyne with him to giue milke to the paille, to haue fresh milke euery day. Furthermore, he sent him a bed thoroughly furnished with all things necessary, & groomes of the chāber to make his bed, saying, that the GREECIANS could not tel how to make it: & did also let him haue men to cary him vpon their armes to the sea side, because he was sicke, & whilest he was at the Court, he entertained him very honorably & bountifullly. So Oflanes, the kings brother, said one day vnto him: Timagoras, remember how honorably thou art serued at thy bord, for it is not for so small matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cur him for his treason, then for any remembrance of the benefit receiued. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condēned the same Timagoras to dye, because he had taken bribes & money of the king of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of so many other things that he had done, to despite the GREECIANS with, he did one thing that pleased them maruelously: when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfulllest en-emye the GREECIANS had. Parysatis the Queene mother did helpe to bringe this to passe, aggrauating the accusations brought in against him. For the king kept not his anger longe against his mother, but fell in againe with her, and sent for her, knowing that she had an excellent witte and noble courage to gouerne a great kingdom: and besides, that there was nothing nowe to let them to come together as much as they would, to giue any occasion of ielousie or malice to any person. So euer after, his mother Parysatis endeavored her selfe

A to feede the king her sonnes humor euery manner of way, seeming to mislike nothing that he did: Whereby she grewe in great credit with him, that he denied her nothing whatsoever she asked him. So she perceiued that the king was extremely in loue with one of his owne Daughters, that was called Atossa: howbeit that he dissembled his loue the best he could, and kept it secret, chiefly for feare of her, although some write, that in deed he had already had her maydenhead. Nowe Parysatis hauing found his loue, she beganne to make more of his Daughter then she did before, and talking with her father, sometyme she prayed her beauty, another tyme her grace and good countenance, saying that she was like a Queene and noble Princessse. So that at length by litle and litle she perswaded him to marrye her openly, not passing for the lawes and opinions of the GREECIANS, considering that God had giuen him vnto the PERSIANS, to stablishe the lawes vnto them, to decyde right from wronge, and the good from the bad. Some Historiographers doe write, and amongst them Heraclides of CYMBES: that Artaxerxes did not onely marie the eldest of his Daughters, but the second also called Ameftis, of whome we will speake hereafter. Nowe when he had married the eldest, Atossa, he loued her so entirely well, that though she fell sicke of the disease commonly called Vittiligo, that ranne ouer all her bodie: he loued her not the worse for it, but prayed continually for her vnto the goddesse Iuno, honoring no other goddesse but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image, and sent by his friends and Lieuutenants to many offerings, that all the way from his Court gates vnto the temple of Iuno, (which was sixteene furlong of) was full of gold, siluer, riche purple filkes, and horse that were sent thither. He beganne to make warre also with the EGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieuutenants, who did no good, because they fell at variance thone with thother. But afterwards, Artaxerxes him selfe went in person to conquer the CADUSIANS with three-hundred thousand foote men, and tenne thousand horse men. So he invaded their contry, which was a very rude contry, alway darke and cloudy: The earth bringeth forth nothing that man soweth, but doth onely feede the inhabitants with peares, apples, and such like fruite, and yet the men be very stronge and valliant notwithstanding. So when he was entred farre into the contry before he was ware, he fell into great want of vittells, and was also in great daunger.
For his souldiers found nothing in all the contry that was good to eate, and worst of all, no vittells could come vnto them from any place, because of the hardnes and naughty wayes of the contry: So that his campe liued onely with the fleshe of their beastes of cariage, and yet they sold it dearly: for, an asses head was sold for three skore siluer Drachmas. To conclude, the famyne was so great, that prouision fayled for the kings owne mouth, and there were but fewe horse left, for all the rest were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes bene chiefe about the king, because he was a valliant man, and that through his folly was many tymes also out of fauor, as at that present tyme, when he had no authoritie nor estimation: he deuised a stratageam, whereby he faued the king and all his campe. In this contry of the CADUSIANS, there were two kinges in the field with their armies, both of them camped a sonder one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had spoken with king Artaxerxes, and had tolde him what he ment to doe: he went vnto one of the kinges, and at the selfe same tyme also seerely sent his sonne vnto the other king, and told either of them, that the other king had sent Ambassadors vnto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, vntwitting to his companion, and therefore he counselled him if they were wise, one of them to seeke to preuent another with all the possible speede he could, and promised them both, one after another, to helpe them the best he could. Both the one and the other of the kinges gaue credit to his wordes, either of them both misftrusting one another: so that the one speedily sent his Ambassadors vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus, and the other also his Ambassadors with his sonne. But Tiribazus taryng long in his iorney, king Artaxerxes beganne somewhat to suspect him, his enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the king grewe very chollye, and repented him that he had trusted him so farre, and was willing to heare euery man that spake against him. Howbeit F Tiribazus at length returned, and his sonne also, and either of them brought with them the Ambassadors of the CADUSIANS, and so peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiri-bazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then euer he was, and so departed with the king. The king then shewed plainly, that cowardlines proceedeth not of pompe and curiositie, as some take it, beleuing that it doth effeminate mens hearts, but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly followeth euill, and the worst counsell. For neither the iewels of gold, the kingly robes, nor other sumptuous ornaments which the king euer ware about him, worth twelue thousand talents as it is reported, did not hinder him at that tyme to trauaile, and to take as much payne as any man in all his army. For he him selfe marched a foote the foremost man, carrying his owne trusse in a scarfe vpon his shoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauelled through high stony mountaines. So that his souldiers seeing the corage and payne the king him selfe tooke, they marched so nymbly, that it seemed they had wings: for he dayly marched aboute two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by fore trauell, came to one of his owne houses, where there were goodly arbors and parkes, with goodly trees passingly sette forth: but all the contry besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruelous cold. The king suffred his souldiers to hewe downe the goodly pynes and cypres trees in his parkes: and because they durst not presume to touch them, he him selfe as he was tooke an axe in his hande and begganne to hewe downe the goodliest tree there. The souldiers seeing that, fell euery man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short tyme they had prouided them felues well with wodde, and made them great fires in euery place, and so past ouer the night quietly by the fires side. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valliant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore thinking his men would mocke him, because he did fayle of his purpose: he begganne to growe mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefeft noble men he had about him: so that in a rage he put many of them to death, but much more of them remayned, whome he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloud sucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary manner nothing is more courteous, and lesse suspicious, then a valliant and hardy man. And therefore brute beastes that be neuer made tame nor mastered, are commonly cowardly, and timorous: and the other to the contrary, that are noble and coragious, are bold straight, and doe come to knowe a man, because they haue no feare, neither doe they flic from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards king Artaxerxes being grown very olde, heard that there was great sturre and contention betwene his sonnes, which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contention fell out also amonge his friends and men, of great calling. The wisest of them wished, that as he him selfe came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldest sonne: so that he likewise should after his death leaue it vnto his eldest sonne, called Darius. But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valliant man, and of a whol stirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his parte, and hoped to attayne to his purpose, by the means of his sister Astossa, whome he loued and honored, promising to marry her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers disceale. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he secretly kept her: howbeit Artaxerxes neuer vnderstoode it. Now, because he would sometimes put his sonne Ochus out of all hope to succede him in the kingdom, least this expectation might make him to goe about to practise that which Cyrus did, and that by this means his Realme should growe into faction and ciuill warres: he proclaimeh his eldest sonne Darius (being fiftye yeare olde) king after his death, and furthermore gaue him leaue from thenceforth to weare the poynt of his hat right vp. In Persia the custom is, that when any commeth to be proclaimeh successor and heire apparent to the crowne, he should require a giste of him that proclaimeh him successor. The which the other doth graunt him, whatsoeuer it be that he asketh, so it be not impossible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aspasia, who was first with Cyrus, & in greatest fauor with him aboue all the rest, but then was for the kings own bodye. She was borne in the contry of Ionia, of free parents: and being virtuously brought vp, she was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at supper with other women, who saue them downe, without too curious bidding, hard by him, and were verie glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merie with them, geuing euerie one of them some pleasaunt word, and they made it not coy. But Aspasia stoode on her feet by the table, and sayd neuer a word: and notwithstanding that Cyrus called her, she woulde not come at him. Moreouer, when one of

A the groomes of his chamber would haue taken her to haue brought her to him: the first faith she, that layeth hands on me, shall repent it. Thereupon all those that were present, said she was a foolish thing, and simply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, passed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: doest thou not see, that of all these thou hast brought me, there is not an honest woman but she? After that, Cyrus began to make much of her, and loued her better continually then all the rest, & called her Aspasia the wife. This Aspasia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouerthrowen, and Darius as we haue told ye, did begge her of his father, who was verie angrie with it in his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruelous gealous of their women, so that not onely he should be put to death, that durst but speake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in sport: but also who soeuer came nere them, or neere their coches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Astossa, whom he had married against all lawe, was yet liuing, and besides her he had also three hundred and three score passing fayer concubines: and yet when his sonne Darius asked Aspasia of him, the king answered, she was a free woman borne, and therefore if she woulde, he was content he should haue her: but if she were vnwilling to goe to him, then he would not haue him force her by no means. So Aspasia was sent for, and she was asked with whom she had rather be. She answered, with Darius: contrarie to king Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the custome, and also the law, was compelled to let him haue her. But shortly after he tooke her from him againe, saying that he woulde place her in a Nunrie of Diana, in the contrie of Ecbatane, where they call her Anitis, there to serue the goddesse, and to liue chaste all the daies of her life: supposing by this meanes to punish his sonne, not rigorously, but moderately, with griefe mixt with sporte and earnest. Howbeit his sonne tooke it not so patiently, either because he was deepe in loue with Aspasia, or else for that he saw his father mocke him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiuing that Darius tooke it verie grieuoullie: he aggravated his anger against his father, knowing the passion of loue in Darius, by his owne, vpon the like occasion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, and had promised Pharnabazus one of them, called Artama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune: and to Tiribazus, Amestris. The king performed the other two marriages, & did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king him selfe married his owne daughter Amestris, and for her, he promised Tiribazus the younger, Astossa: with whom also he him selfe fell in loue, and married her. Tiribazus hereupon was in such a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death: not because he was any traitor or feditious man in nature, but a madde harebrained fellow. For sometime he was aloft, and in as good credit and authoritie as the best: so daingly againe he woulde playe some madde parte to anger the king, and then he was in as much disgrace, and out of countenance: and could not away with neither fortune. For when he was in authoritie, he made euerie man hate him for his pride: and being in disgrace, he could not humble him selfe, but looke bigger then before. Nowe there was fire and brimstone met, when Tiribazus tooke parte with Darius. For he dayly blew into his eares, that it was no purpose for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires also went not rightly forward: and that he deceiued him selfe much, if he did not know that his brother (by means of the women he kept) secretly aspired to the crowne: and that his father being so vnconstant as he was, he must not trust in any sorte to succede his father in the kingdom, what proclamation soeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrary. For, sayd he, he that for a Grecian woman hath broken and violated the holiest lawe that was in Persia: thou must not looke that he will performe that he hath promised thee. And furthermore he perswaded him, that it was not a like repulse vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for: as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For sayd he, if it please Ochus to liue like a priuate man, he may safelie doe it, and no man will trouble him: but for him selfe that was already proclaimed king, he must of necessitie make him selfe king, or else he must not liue. So the Poet Sophocles his saying most commonly proueth true:

neth. But now beside these persuasions, the greatnes of the kingdome, and the feare Darius stood in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force and effect with him: and it may be also, that Pennis her selfe did somewhat in the matter, for the malice and spight that Aspasia was taken from him. But whatsoever the cause was, thus was it handled: that Darius flatly conspired against his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they having gotten many conspirators to ioyne with them, one of the kings Euenukes perceiving it, ranne and told the king of it, and how they had sodainly determined to assaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among them selues, that they should kill him in his bedde in the night. Artaxerxes receiving this advertisement, thought it was not good to be carelesse of a matter of so great importance as his life: and also that it were too great lightnes in him so sodainly to beleue his Euenuke, without better prooffe or knowledge. So he tooke this way with him selfe. He commaunded the Euenuke that had geuen him this information, to keepe companie still with the conspirators, & to follow them wheresoever they went, to see their doings: and in the meane time he bet downe his wall behind his bed, and made a dore thorowe, and set vp a hanging of tapistrie before it. When the time was come, as the Euenuke had advertised the king, that the traitors ment to doe their feate: Artaxerxes being layed on his bedde, rose not vp till he had seene euerie traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then when he sawe them comming towards him with their swords drawn, he sodainly lift vp the hanging, and got in to his inner chamber, & shut the dore after him, making an outcrie, murder, murder. So the traitors being plainly seene and known by the king, fled the same way they came, and failed of their purpose, and bad Tiribazus save him selfe, because he was known. So they dispersed them selues, and scaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardie, although he had slaine diuers of the kings gard, valiantly defending him selfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was stricken with a dart a good way off, which slewe him. Darius was also taken and apprehended, and brought prisoner with his sonnes: and the king referred him to be iudged by his peeres. For the king him selfe would not be present to geue iudgement of him, but deputed others in his placeto accuse him: howbeit he commaunded his secretaries to set downe in writing the opinion and sentence of euerie one of the Iudges and to bring it him. In fine, they all cast him, and condemned him to dye. Then the officers layed hold on him, and brought him into a chamber of the prison, where the hangman came with a raser in his hande with the which he vied to cut mens throates so condemned to dye. So the hangman comming into the chamber, when he saw it was Darius, he was affrayed, and came out of the chamber againe, his hart failing him, and durst not lay handes vpon the person of the king. But the Iudges that stood without the chamber, bad him goe and doe it, vnlesse he would haue his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the heare of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and so cut his necke with his raser he had in his other hand. Others doe write, that this sentence was geuen in the presence of king Artaxerxes selfe, and that Darius seeing him selfe conuicted by manifest proofes brought in against him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and besought him to pardon him: and then that his father being angrie, rose vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in so many places withall, that at length he slue him. Then returning into the Court, he worshipped the sunne, and turning him to his Lords that were about him, he sayd vnto them. My Lordes, God be with you, and be merie at home in your houses, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them that practised treason against me. This was the end of Darius treason. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother stood in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, & the rather, through the meanes and frendshippe of his sister Aspasia: but yet of his legitimate bretheren, he feared him called Ariaspes, who was onely left of all the rest that were legitimate: and of his bastard bretheren, Arfames, not because Ariaspes was elder than he, but for that he was of a soft & plaine nature, the PERSIANS desired he might be their king. On the other side, Arfames was wise, and valliant: and Ochus sawe that his father loued him dearly. So he determined to intrappe them both. Now Ochus being a futtle and malicious natured man, he first shewed his crueltye vpon Arfames, and his malice vpon Ariaspes his legitimate brother. For, because he knewe he was but simple and plaine, he sent dayly some of the kings Euenukes vnto him, who brought

So, forging these newes continually as things verie secret, they did so terrifie poore Ariaspes, telling him that the king was fullie bent to put some of his threats in execution out of hand: that he was put in such feare and dispaire of his life, that he prepared him selfe a poyson, and dranke it, to ridde him selfe of his life. King Artaxerxes understanding of his death, tooke it very heauily, & began to mistrust the cause that made him to make him selfe away: howbeit he could not seeke the prooffe of it, for his extreame age. But this chauce made him loue Arfames better then before, shewing plainly that he trusted him better then Ochus, and did make him priue to all things. Ochus could no longer abide to deferre his intent, and therefore entised Harpaces, Tiribazus sonne, to kill his bastard brother Arfames: the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was so extreame olde, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his sonne Arfames was murdered, he coulde beare it no longer, but tooke it so to his hart for sorow, that when he had liued foure score and fouretene yeares, and reigned three score and two, he dyed. When he was dead, they then found that he had bene a gracious & courteous Prince, and one that loued his people and subiectes: when they saw the prooffe of his successor Ochus, that passed all men liuing, in crueltye and feuerity.

Dion.

Like as Simonides, & Sofistus Senecio, saith that the city of LIVIA was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make warre with them with other GRÆCIANS, because Glaucus, whose first ancestors came from CORINTH, had taken armes, & ioungly fought for the same: euen so me thinks, that neither the GRÆCIANS nor ROMANES haue cause to complaine of the Academy, sith they be both alike praised of the same in this present booke, in the which are conteigned the liues of Dion and Brutus. Of the which the one of them hauing bene verie familiar with Plato him selfe, and the other from his childhoode brought vp in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one selfe schoolehouse, to attempt the greatest enterprises amongst men. And it is no maruell if they two were muche like in many of their doings, prouing that true which their schoolemaister

Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the gouernment of a common wealth, which A should be famous, and of credit, authoritie, and good fortune, must both meete in one selfe person, ioined with iustice and wisdom. For, as a certaine fensler called Hippomachus said, that he knewe his schollers farre of, if he did but see them comming from the market with meate in their handes: so it must needs follow, that men hauing bene vertuously brought vp, must nedes be wise in all their doings, and beside that it bringeth them to ciuillitie and honestly, euen so it frameth their condicions muche like one vnto another. Furthermore, their fortunes hauing alio fallen out both alike, more by chaunce then by any reason, do make their liues verie like to eache other. For, they were both of them slaine, before they could bring their enterprises to passe which they had determined. But the greatest wonder of all is this: that their deathes were forehewed vnto them both, by a wicked spirit that visiblie appeared vnto either B of them: albeit there be some that can not abide those opinions, and doe maintaine that these fights and euill spirits doe neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of litle children, or old women, or of some men that their wits are weakened by sickenes, and so haue a certaine imagination of such strange sightes, being of this superstitious minde, that they haue a wicked spirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philosphers, and verie constant men, not overcome by any so daime passion or imagination of minde, haue bene moued by such fights and spirits, and haue also tolde it vnto their frendes: I can not tell whether we shall be enforced, to graunt the most straungest and oldest opinion of this, which sayth: that there be euill spirits which enuying the vertue of good men, to withdraw them from their godly mindes, doe make them affrayed C with these fearefull sightes, intising them to forsake their godminyes, least that persisting therein, they should be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this disputacion to some other booke, and now in this twelfth couple of these famous mens liues compared, let vs first begin to write the life of him that is the elder of these two men we speake of.

Dionysius the elder, after he had the gouernment of SYCILIA in his handes, he married the daughter of Hermocrates, a citizen of SYRACUSA. But yet not being throughlie settled in his tyrannie, the SYRACUSANS did rebell against him, & did so cruellie and abhominablie handle the bodie of his wife, that she willingly poysoned her selfe. So after he had established him selfe in his gouernment with more suretie then before, he married againe two other wiues D together, the one a straunger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the contry it selfe, called Aristomaché, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefeft man of all SYRACUSA, and that had bene companion with Dionysius, the first time he was chosen Generall. It was sayd that Dionysius married them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knewe first: but otherwise, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly sate together with him at his table, and did either of them lye with him by turnes: though the SYRACUSANS would haue their owne contrywoman preferred before the straunger. Howebeit the strange woman had this good happe, to bring forth Dionysius his eldest sonne, which was a good countenance to defend her, being a foreiner. Aristomaché in contrarie manner, continued a long time with Dionysius, without fruite of her wombe, although he was verie desirous to haue children by her: so that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with forceries and witchcraft, kept Aristomaché from being with child. Dion being the brother of Aristomaché, was had in great estimation at the first, for his sisters sake: but afterwards the tyrant finding him to be a wife man, he loued him the for his owne sake. Insomuch, that among many sundrie things & pleasures he did for him: he commaunded his Treasurers to let him haue what money he asked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the selfe same day they gaue him any. Nowe though Dion had euer before a noble minde in him by nature, yet muche more did that magnanimitie increase, when Plato by good fortune arriued in SYCILIA. For his comming thither surelie was no mans deuile, as I take it, but the verie prouidence of some god: who (bringing farre of the first beginning and fundacion of the libertie of the SYRACUSANS, and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall state) sent Plato out of ITALIE vnto the citie of SYRACUSA, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who

scholler.

A was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter witte to learne, and redier good-will to follow vertue, then any young man elle that followed Plato: as Plato him selfe writeth, and his owne doings also doe witnesse. For Dion hauing from a child bene brought vp with humble conditions vnder a tyrant, and acquainted with a leuile timorous life, with a prowde and insolent reigne, with all vanity and curiositie, as placing chiefe felicity in countenoules: neuertheless, after he had felt the sweete reasons of Philosphie, teaching the broad way to vertue, his hart was enflamed straight with earnest desire to follow the same. And because he found that he was so easilie perswaded to loue vertue and honestie, he simple thinking (being of an honest plaine nature) that the selfe same perswasions would moue a like affection in Dionysius: obtained of Dionysius, that being at leasure, he was contented to see Plato, and to speake with him. B When Plato came to Dionysius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, and they chiefly reasoned what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrans were no valliant men. From thence passing further into iustice, he told him that the life of iust men was happy, and contrarily the life of vnjust men vnfortunate. Thus the tyrant Dionysius perceiuing he was overcome, durst no more abide him, and was angrie to see the standers by to make such estimation of Plato, and that they had such delight to heare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, what businessse he had to doe there: Plato answered him, he came to seeke a good man. Dionysius then replied againe: what, in Gods name, by thy speache then it seemeth thou hast founde none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionysius anger would proceede no further, and therefore at Platoes earnest request, he sent him away in a galley with three bankes of owers, the which C Pollis a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GREECE. Howbeit Dionysius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as euer he would doe him pleasure: if not, yet that he would sell him for a slaue, howsoever he did. For said he, he shall be nothing the worse for that: because if he be a iust man, he shall be as happy to be a slaue, as a freeman. Thus, as it is reported, this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of ÆGINA, and there fold him. For the ÆGINETES hauing warre at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Ile, should be sold. This notwithstanding, Dionysius refused not to honor and trust Dion, as much as euer he did before, and did also sende him Ambassador in matters of great weight. As when he sent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued him selfe so well, that he wan great reputation by his iorney: and the tyrant could well away D with his plaine speach. For no man but he, durst say their mindes so boldly vnto him, to speake what he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernment before the tyrans face, and that Dionysius him selfe sayd (finely deskaning of his name, which signifieth laughter) that he was euen the verie laughing rocke him selfe of SYCILIA: the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter passingly well. But Dion not being well pleased withall, sayd vnto him: for his sake, men trusted thee, whereby thou camest to be tyrant: but for thine owne sake they will neuer trust any man. For, to say truly, Gelon shewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to see a citie gouerned by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his gouernment on thother side, made it appeare as detestable a thing. This Dionysius had by his LOCRIAN E wife three children, and by Aristomaché foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophrosyne, and the other Areté. Of them, Dionysius eldest sonne married Sophrosyne, and Areté was married vnto his brother Thearides, after whose death Dion married her, being his Nece. Now when Dionysius her father fell sicke, not likely to escape: Dion would haue spoken with him for his children he had by his sister Aristomaché. Howbeit the Phisitions about him, to currie fauor with the next heire and successor of the tyrannie, would neuer let him haue any time or opportunitie to speake with him. For, as Timaeus writeth, they gaue Dionysius the elder (as he had commaunded them) a strong opiat drinke to cast him in a sleepe, and so thereby they tooke from him all his senses and ioyned death with his sleepe. Notwithstanding, in the first counsell and assemblee holden by his frendes, to consult about the state and affaires of the younger Dionysius: Dion moued matter so necessarie and profitable for that present time, that by his wisdom he shewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke speach, made them know that they were but slaues of the tyranny: because they beafly and cowardly gaue such counsell and aduise, as might best please and feede the young tyrannes humor. A But he made them most to wonder at him, when they feare about all other things, the daunger Dionysius state was in, by reason of CARTAGAGE, he did promise them, that if Dionysius would haue peace, he would then goe forthwith into AFRICKA, and finde the meanes honorable to quene the warres: or if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he would furnishe him at his owne proper costes and charges, fittie gallies readie to rowe. Dionysius wondered greatlie at the noble minde of Dion, and thanked him muche for the good will he bare vnto him, touching his estate. But all men else taking Dions noble offer to be a reproach of their auarice, and his credit and authoritie, and impaire vnto theirs: they presentlie vpon this libell offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not sparing any reprochefull wordes against him, to moue Dionysius to be offended with him. For they complayned of him, and sayd that he cunninglie practised to possesse the tyrannie, making him selfe strong by sea, going about by his gallies to make the tyrannie fall into the hands of the children of Aristomache his sister. But the chiefeft cause of all why they did malice and hate him, was his straunge manner of life: that he neither would keepe companie with them, nor lue after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and frendshippe with this younge euill brought vp tyranne, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleasures: studied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in loue matters, and other vaine exercisies, as to riot and banquet, to keepe light women companie, and all suche other vile vicious pastimes and recreations, by the which the tyrannie became like iron softened by fire, and seemed to be verie pleasaunt vnto the subiectes, bicause the ouergreat Maiestie and seueritie thereof was somewhat milder, not so muche by the bountie and goodnesse, as by the follie and rechelesnes of the Lorde. Thus, this lide care and regarde increasing more and more, still winning way with the younge tyrann: did at length melt and breake a sunder those strong diamond chaines, with the whiche Dionysius the elder made his boast that he left his Monarchie and tyrannie chained to his sonne. For sometime he would be three dayes together without intermission, still banking and being dronke: and all that time his Court gates were kept shut vnto graue and wife men, and for all honest matters, and was then full of dronkards, of common playes, dauncings, maskes, and mommeries, and full of all such tromperie and dissolute pastimes. And therefore Dion vndoubtedlie was muche enuied of them, bicause he gaue him selfe to no sport nor pleasure: whereupon they accused him, and misnamed his vertues, vices, being somewhat to be resembled vnto them. As in calling his grauetie, pride: his plainnes and boldnesse in his Oration, obstinacie: if he did perfwade them, that he accused them: and bicause he would not make one in their sonde pastimes: that therefore he despised them. For to say truelie, his manners by nature had a certeine hawiness of minde and seueritie, and he was a sower man to be acquainted with: whereby his companie was not onely troublesome, but also vnpleasaunt to this younge Dionysius, whose eares were so fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his verie frendes and familiars, that did like and commend his plaine manner of speache and noble minde: they did yet reprove his sternenes, and austere conuersation with men. For it seemed vnto them, that he spake too roughlie, and delt ouerhardlie with them that had to doe with him, and more then became a ciuill or courteous man. And for prooofe herof, Plato him selfe sometime wrote vnto him (as if he had prophacied what shoulde happen) that he shoulde beware of obstinacie, the companion of solitarinesse, that bringeth a man in the ende to be forsaken of euerie one. This notwithstanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man else: bicause of the state and government, and for that they thought him the onely man that could best prouide for the safetie and quietnesse of the tyrannie, the which stooode then in tickle state. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not so well taken and esteemed through the good will of the tyrann, as against his will, and for the necessitie of the state and time. So Dion supposing that ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionysius was the cause: he deuised to put him into some honest trade or exercise, and to teach him the liberrall sciences, to frame him to a ciuill life, that thenceforth he shoulde no more be affrayed of vertue, and shoulde also take pleasure and delight in honest things. For Dionysius of his owne nature, was none of the

A the worst sort of tyrans, but his father feare that if he came once to haue a feeling and conceite of him selfe, or that he companied with wife and learned men, he would goe neere to enter into practise, and put him out of his seate: he euer kept him locked vp in a chamber, and would suffer no man to speake with him. Then the younge Dionysius hauing nothing else to do, gaue himselfe to make lide chariots, candlesticks, chaires, stools, and tables of wodde. For his father Dionysius was so fearefull and mistrustfull of euerie bodie, that he would suffer no man with a paire of barbers sissors to polle the heares of his head, but caused an image maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hotte burning cole to burne his goodly bush of heare rounde about. No man came into his chamber where he was, with a gowne on his backe, nor not his owne brother nor sonne, but he was driuen before he coulde come in, to put of his gowne, and the garde of his chamber to strippe him naked whatsoeuer he was: and then they gaue him an other gowne to cast vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines, going about to describe vnto him the scituation of some place, he tooke a halberd from one of the garde, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a platte of the same vpon the ground. Dionysius was terrible offended with him, and did put the souldier to death that gaue him his halberd. He sayed he was affrayed of his frendes, yea, and of the wisest of them: bicause he knewe that they desired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to commaunde, then to obey. He slewe one of his Captaines called Marsias, whome he had preferred, and had geuen him charge of men: bicause he dreamed that he killed him: saying that he dreamed of this in the night, bicause that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionysius C that was so timorous, and whose mind through fearefulness was still miserable occupied: he was notwithstanding maruelouslie offended with Plato, bicause he did not iudge him to be the noblest and valliantest man aliue. Dion therefore seeing (as we haue sayd) the younge Dionysius cleane marred, and in manner cast away for lacke of good education: perfwaded him the best he coulde to geue him selfe vnto studie, and by the greatest intreatie he coulde possible make, to pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into SICILE. And then when through his intreatie he were come, that he would referre him selfe whollie vnto him, to thende that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby: (the best example that can be possible, and by whom all the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which otherwise were out of all order and confused) he shoulde first obtaine great happines to him D selfe, and consequently vnto all his citizens also, who euer after through the temperance and iustice of a father, would with good will doe those things, which they presentlie vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lorde, and in doing this, from a tyrann he shoulde come to be a king. For the chaines of a diamant to keepe a realme in safetie, were not force, and feare, as his father Dionysius helde opinion: neither the great multitude of young souldiers, nor the garde of ten thousand barbarous people: but in contrarie manner, that they were the loue and good will of their subiectes, which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and iustice: the which chaines though they be slacke then the other that are so hard and stiffe, yet are they stronger, and will last longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdom in safetie. And furthermore, the Prince (sayd he) is not desirous of honor, neither is a man that deserueth greatly to be praised and commended, that onely studieth to weare sumptuous apparell, and that glorieth to see his Court richelie furnished, and him selfe curiously ferued: and in the meane time doth not frame him selfe to speake better, to be wiser, and to carie a greater maiesty then any other meane or common person, not esteeming to adorne and beawtifie the Princely pallace of his minde, as becommeth the royall maiestie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearsing these exhortacions vnto Dionysius, and otherwhile enterlacing betwene, some reasons he had learned of Plato: he grafed in him a wonderfull, and as it were a vehement desire to haue Plato in his companie, and to learne of him. So sundry letters came from Dionysius vnto ATHENS, diuers requestes from Dion, and great intreaty made by certaine Pythagorian Philosophers, that prayed and perfwaded Plato to come into SICILE, to bridle the light disposition of this young man, by his graue F and wise instructions: who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therefore Plato, as him selfe reporteth, blushing to him selfe, and feareing least he shoulde geue men cause to thinke that it was but the opinion men had of him, and that of him selfe he was vn-

willing to do any worthe act: and further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, A who was the only guide of all the rest, he should as it were recouer all SICILIA from her corruption and fickness: he performed their requests that sent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the change and alteration of Dionysius, they perswaded him to call Philistus the Historiographer home againe from banishment, who was a learned man, and had bene brought vp and acquainted with the tyrans facions: to thend he should serue as a counterpeace, to withstande Plato and his Philosophie. For this Philistus, from the first time that the tyrannie beganne to be established, did shew him selfe verie willing and conformable to the establishment thereof, and had of long time kept the castell: and the voyce went, that he kept the mother of Dionysius the elder, and as it was supposed, not altogether without the tyrans knowledge. But afterwards, Leptines hauing had two daughters by one woman, whom he inticed to folie being an other mans wife: he married one of these his daughters vnto Philistus, and made not Dionysius priuie to it before. The tyranne therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison fast locked vp, and draue Philistus out of SICILIA. He being banished thus, repayed vnto some of his frendes that dwelt about the Adriaticke sea, where it seemeth he wrote the most parte of all his historie, being then at good leisure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionysius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, caused them to procure Philistus calling home againe, as we haue told you, as the man they thought would sticke slowly in defense of the tyranny. So Philistus no sooner returned, but he stowly began to defend the tyranny: & others in contrary maner, deuiled accusations to the tyrant against Dion, accusing him that he had practised with Theodotes and Heraclides, to ouerthrowe the tyrannie of Dionysius. For Dion, in my opinion, helped by Platoes comming to bridle and lessen a litle the ouerlicentious and imperious tyrannie of Dionysius, and thereby to frame Dionysius a wife and righteous gouernor. But on the other side, if he saw he would not follow his counsell, and that he yielded not to his wife instructions: he then determined to put him downe, & to bring the gouernment of the common wealth into the hands of the SYRACVSANS: not that he allowed of Democrasia (to wit, where the people gouerne) but yet certainly thinking that Democrasia was much better then the tyrannie, when they could not come vnto Aristocratia, to wit, the gouernment of a few of the nobilitie. Now things being in this state, Plato arriued in SICILIE, where he was maruelously receiued and honored by Dionysius. For when he landed on the shoare, leauing his galley that brought him: D there was readie for him one of the kings rich and sumptuous chariots to conuey him to the castell: and the tyrant made sacrifice to geue the goddess thanks for his comming, as for some wonderful great good hadde chaunced vnto his seigniorie. Furthermore, the wonderfull modestie and temperance that was begon to be obserued in feasts and bankets, the Court cleane changed, and the great goodnes and clemencie of the tyrant in all thinges, in ministring iustice to euerie man: did put the SYRACVSANS in great good hope of change, and euerie man in the Court was verie desirous to geue him selfe to learning and Philosophie. So that, as men reported, the tyrannes pallace was full of sande and dust, with the numbers of studentes that drewe plattes and figures of Geometrie. Shortlie after Plato was arriued, by chance the time was comen about to doe a solemne sacrifice within the castell, at which sacrifice the Heraulde (as the manner was) proclaimed alowde the solemne prayer accustomed to be done, that it would please the goddess long to preferue the state of the tyrannie: and that Dionysius being harde by him, sayd vnto him, what, wilt thou not leaue to curse me? This worde grieved Philistus and his companions to the harte, thinking that with time, by litle and litle, Plato would winne suche estimation and greate authoritie with Dionysius, that afterwards they shoulde not be able to resist him: considering that in so short a time as he had bene with Dionysius, he had so altered his minde and courage. And therefore they nowe beganne, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuse Dion: and sayd, that it was easie to be seene, howe he charmed and inchaunted Dionysius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to resigne his gouernment, because he would transference it to the hands of the children of his sister Aristomachi. Others seemed to be offended, for that the A THENIANS hauing comen before into

A SICILIA with a great armie, both by sea and land, they were all lost and cast away, and could not win the city of SYRACUSA: & that now by one only Sopliaster, they vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowe the Empire of Dionysius, perswading him to discharge the ten thousand souldiers he had about him for his garde, to forsake the foure hundred galleies, the ten thousand horsemen, and as many moe footemen, to goe to the Academy to seeke an vnknown happines neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, resigning his present happines and felicitie to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleasauntlie, vnto Dion and his Neewes. By such like accusations and wicked tongues, Dionysius began first to mistrust Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vpon him. In the meane time they brought letters Dion wrote secretlie vnto the Gouernors of the cite of CARTHAGE, willing them that when they would make peace with Dionysius, they shoulde not talke with him vnlesse he stood by: assuring them that he would helpe them to set things in quietnes, & that all should be well againe. When Dionysius had red these letters with Philistus, & had taken his aduise & counsell what he should do, as Timaeus said: he deceived Dion vnder pretence of reconciliation, making as though he ment him no hurt, & saying that he would become frends again with him. So he brought Dion one day to the sea side vnder his castell, and shewed him these letters, burdening him to haue practised with the CARTHAGINIANS against him. And as Dion went about to make him answer, to cleere himself: Dionysius would not heare him, but caused him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnase, & commaunded the mariners to fet him a lande vpon the coast of ITALIE. After this was done, and that it was known abroad in the cite, euerie man thought it a cruell parte of Dionysius: insomuche that the tyrans pallace was in a maruelous pecke of troubles, for the great sorowe the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the cite selfe of SYRACUSA began to looke about them, looking for some sodaine great change & inuouation, for the tumult & vprore that would happen by meanes of Dions banishment, and for the mistrust also that all men would haue of Dionysius. Dionysius considering this, and being affrayed of some misfortune, he gaue his frendes and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not banished him, but was contented that he should absent him selfe for a time: being affrayed, that in his sodaine angry moodde he might peraduenture be compelled to do him some worse turne if he remained, because of his obstinacie and selfewill. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions frends two shippes, to carrie as D much goodes, money, and as many of Dions seruantes as they would, and to conuey them vnto him vnto PELOPONNESVS. Dion was a maruelous rich man, & for the pompe of his seruice, and sumptuous moueables of his house, they were like vnto the perion of a tyrant. All these riches Dions frendes brought aboard vpon those shippes, and caried them vnto him: besides many other rich gifts, which the women and his frends sent vnto him. So that by meanes of his great riches, Dion was marueloullie esteemed among the GRACIANS: who by the riches of a banished citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyranne might be. But now concerning Plato: when Dion was exiled, Dionysius caused him to be lodged in his castell, and by this meanes crassilie placed, vnder cloke of frendshippe, an honorable garde about him: because he shoulde not returne into GRACE to seeke Dion, to tell him of the iniurie he had done E vnto him. Howbeit Dionysius often frequenting his companie, (as a wilde beast is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke so well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue. For he would haue Plato to loue none but him, and that he shoulde esteeme him about all men liuing, being readie to put the whole realme into his handes, and all his forces: so that he would thinke better of him, then of Dion. Thus was this passionate affection of Dionysius grievous vnto Plato. For he was so drowned with the loue of him, as men extreamelie jealous of the women they loue: that in a moment he would suddenly fall out with him, and straight againe become frendes, and pray him to pardon him. And to say truelie, he had a maruelous desire to heare Platoes Philosophie: but on the other side, he reuerenced them that did disswade him from it, and told him that he would spoyle him selfe, if he entred ouer deeplie into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupon he sent Plato againe away, promising him that the next spring he would sende for Dion home. But he brake promise therein, and yet sent him his reuenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promise at his time appointed. For he alleaged the warre was the A cause, and that so soone as he had ended his warre, he woulde sende for Dion: whome in the meane time he prayed to haue patience and not to attempt any sturre or alteration against him, nor to speake euill of him among the Græcians. This Plato sought to bring to passe, and brought Dion to studie Philosophie, and kept him in the Academy at Athenes. Dion lay in the cite of Athenes with one Callippus, whome he had knowne of long time, howbeit he bought him a house in the contrie, to lye there sometime for his pleasure, the which he gaue afterwards (at his returne into Sicilia) vnto Speusippus that kept him company, and was continually with him, more then with any other friend he had in Athenes, through Platoes counsell: who to soften and recreate Dions manners, gaue him the company of some pleasant conceited man, knowing that this Speusippus coulde modellie oblerue time and place to be pleasant and merie: for which respect, Timon in his Satyricall ieafts, calleth Speusippus a good iea-ster. Nowe Plato him selfe hauing vnderaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dauncings of young children: Dion tooke these paynes to teache and exercise them, and more-ouer was him selfe at the whole charge of these playes, Plato suffering him to bestowe that liberality and curtesie vpon the Athenians: the which wanne Dion a great deale more good will, then Plato honor. Dion kept not still at Athenes, but went also to see the other good cities of Græce, passing his time away. He being at common feastes and assemblies with the chiefest men, and bestlearned in matters of estate and gouernment, & neuer shewing any light partes, nor signe of tyrannicall pride in his manner of life, nor of a man that had bene brought vp with all pompe and pleasure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well studied in Philosophie, whereby he grew to be generallie beloued and esteemed of all men: the cities graunted him publike honors, and sent him decrees of his glorie, made in their counsellis & assemblies.

Furthermore, the Lacedæmonians made him a Spartan & burges of the city, not passing for Dionysius displeasure, though at that time he had geuen them great aide, in the warre they made against the Thebans. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Ptolemy Ma-garian, to come and see him at his house: and Dion went thither. This Ptolemy was a ma-rueulous great rich man, & therefore Dion seeing a great number of people standing at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and speake with him he had such great busines: he turned vnto his friends that did accompanie him, who were angrie they made him tarie so long at the gate, and sayd vnto them: what cause haue we to thinke euill of him, sith we did the like when we were at Syracusa? But Dionysius being incensed with enuie against him, and fearing the good will the Græcians bare him: he kept backe his reueneue, and would no more sende it him, and seafed all his goodes, the which he gaue to his receiuers to keepe. Furthermore, bi-cause he woulde cleere him selfe of the infamie he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for Platoes sake, he sent for diuers wife and learned men, and vainly coueting to excell them all in wisedom, he was driuen improperly, and out of time, to alleage many wise sayings he had learned of Plato. Thereuppon he beganne againe to wish for him, and to condemne him selfe, for that he had no wit to vse him well when he had him at his commaundement, and that he had not heard so muche as he should haue done of him: and like a tyranne as he was, madlie caried away with light desires, and easilie chaunging minde from time to time, a foudaine vehement desire tooke him in the heade, to haue Plato againe. So he fought all the meanes and waies he coulde deuise, to pray Archytas the Pythagorian Philosopher to tel him, that he might boldly come, and to be his surety vnto him for that he woulde promise him: for first of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therefore Archytas sent thither Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent certeine gallies, and some of his frendes thither, to pray Plato to come to him: and he him selfe wrote speciallie, and plainly, that it should not goe well with Dion, if Plato came not into Sicilia: but if he woulde be perfwaded to come, that then he would doe what he would haue him. Many letters and requests came vnto Dion from his wife and sister, insomuche as Dion vsed the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionysius, without making any excuse at all. So Plato wryteth him selfe, that he was driuen to come againe the third time into the straight of Sicilia:

into Sicilia.*

A Nowe Plato being arriued in Sicilia, he made Dionysius a great ioyfull man, and filled all Sicilia againe with great good hope: for they were all verie desirous, and did what they could, to make Plato overcome Philistus and the tyrannie, with his Philosophie. The women of Dionysius Court did entertaine Plato the best they could: but aboute all, Dionysius seemed to haue a marueous trust and affiance in him, and more then in any other of all his frendes. For he suffered Plato to come to him without searching of him, and oftentimes offered to geue him a great summe of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Aristippus Cyrenian being at that time in the tyrannes Court in Sicilia, sayd that Dionysius bestowd his liberalie iurelie. For, to vs that aske much he geueth litle, and much vnto Plato that requieth nothing. After Dionysius had geuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion, on the other side, at the first did vse him with fine delays, but afterwards he shewed him selfe angrie in deede: and at length fell out with Plato, but yet so couertlie, that others saw it not. For Dionysius dissembled that, and otherwise in all other things he did him as much honor as he coulde deuise, practising thereby to make him to forsake Dions frendshippe. Now Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be geuen to his wordes, and that all were but lyes and deuises he either sayd or did: howbeit he kept it to him selfe, and euer patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he beleued him. They two thus fine-lie dissembling with eache other, thinking to deceiue all men, and that none shoulde vnderstande their secrets: Helycon Cyzicenean, one of Platoes frendes, did prognosticate the eclipse of the funne. The same falling out as he had prognosticated, the tyrant esteemed maruelously of him, and gaue him a siluer talent for his labor. Then Aristippus sporting with other Philosophers, sayd he coulde tell them of a straunger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognosticate, sayd he, that Plato and Dionysius will be enemies ere it be long. In thend it came to passe, that Dionysius made parte sale of all Dions goodes, and kept the money to him selfe, and lodged Plato that before lay the next Court to his pallace, among the fouldiers of his gard, whom he knewe maliced him of long time, and fought to kill him: because he did perfwade Dionysius to leaue his tyranny and to lue without his gard. Plato being in this instant danger, Archytas sent Ambassadors forthwith vnto Dionysius, in a galley of thirtie owers, to demand Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to Syracusa, vpon his worde and caution. Dionysius to excuse him selfe, and to shewe that he was not angrie with him at his departure from him: he made him all the great cheere and feastes he coulde, and so sent him home with great shewes of good will. One day among the rest, he sayd vnto Plato: I am affrayd Plato, sayd he, that thou wilt speake euill of me, when thou art among thy frendes and companions in the Academy. Then Plato smiling, aunsw-ered him againe: the goddes forbidde that they shoulde haue suche scarcetie of matter in the Academy, as that they must needs talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, as it is reported, although that which he him selfe wryteth agreeth not much with this reporte. These things went to Dions harte, so that shortly after he shewed him selfe an open enemy vnto Dionysius, but specially when he heard how he had handled his wife, Plato vnder couert wordes, sent Dionysius worde of it by his letters. And thus it was. After Dion was exiled Dionysius returning E Plato backe againe, he willed him secretlie to seele Dions minde, whether he woulde not be angrie that his wife should be married to an other man: because there ranne a rumor abroade (whether it were true, or inuented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and could not lue quietlie with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at Athenes, and had tolde Dion of all things, he wrote a letter vnto Dionysius the tyranne, and did sette all other things downe so plainelie, that euerie man might vnderstande him, but this one thing only so darkelie, that he alone, and none other coulde vnderstande him, but him to whom he had wrytten: declaring vnto him, that he had spoken with Dion about the matter he wrote of, and that he did lette him vnderstande he woulde be marueous angrie, if Dionysius did it. So at that time, because there was great hope of reconciliation betwene them, the tyranne did nothing larelie touching his sister, but suffered her still to remaine with Dions sonne. But when they were so farre out, that there was no more hope to returne in fauour againe, and that he had also sent home Plato in disgrace and displeasure: then he married his sister Arete

(Dions wife) against her will, vnto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein his fathers iustice and lenitie. For Polyxenus that had married his fathers sister Thesia, being also become his enemy: he fled out of SICILIA. Dionysius the elder sent for his sister Thesia, and tooke her vp verie sharply, for that she knowing her husbande would flee, she did not come and tell him of it. Thesia noble answered him againe, and neuer was affrayed nor abashed: why, Dionysius, dost thou thinke me a woman so faint hearted and beasliffe, that if I had known my husband would haue gone his way, and left me: that I would not haue taken the fea with him, and both haue runne one fortune together? Truly I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had bene more for mine honor to haue bene called the wife of the banished Polyxenus, then the sister of thee a tyrant. Dionysius marvelled to heare his sister speake thus boldly, and the SYRACVSANS wondred at her noble courage: inso much that when the tyrant B was utterly destroyed, they did not refuse to doe her all the honor they could deuise, as vnto a Queene. And when she was deade also, all the citizens of SYRACUSA by a common decree, did accompanie her bodie at her buriall. This litle digression from our historie, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now againe to our matter. Dion from thenceforth disposed him selfe altogether vnto warre, against Platoes counsell and aduise: who did his best endeavour to dissuade him from it, both for the respect of Dionysius good entertainment he had geuen him, as also for that Dion was of great yeares. Howbeit on the other side, Speusippus, and his other frendes did prouoke him vnto it, and did perswade him to deliuer SICILIA from the slauerie and bondage of the tyrant, the which helde vp her handes vnto him, and would receiue him with great loue and good will. For whilest Plato lay at SYRACUSA, Speusippus keeping the citizens companie more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first they were affrayed to open them selues vnto him, and franklie to speake what they thought, mistrusting he was a spie vnto the tyrant, sent amongst them to feele their mindes: but within a short time they beganne to trust him, and were all of one minde, for they prayed and perswaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwise for bringing of shippes, souldiers, nor horses with him, but onely to hyre a shippe, and to lend the SICILIANS his bodie and name against Dionysius. Speusippus reporting these newes vnto Dion, did put him in good hart againe: whereupon he began secretly to leaue men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers doe set forward Dions warres. Many citizens dealing in the affaires of the common wealth did aide him, and diuers of them also that onely gaue their mindes to the studie of Philosophie: and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whose death Aristotle wrote his dialogue of the soule) and Timonides LEVCIAN went with him. Furthermore, there ioyned also with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothsayer, and that had bene his companion in studie in the Academy. Nowe of all them whom the tyrant had banished, (which were no lesse then a thousand persons) there were but onely fise and twentie that durst accompanie him in this warre. For all the other were suche dastardes, that they forooke him, and durst not goe with him. The place where they appointed to meete, was the Ile of ZACYNTH, where they leauied all their souldiers, that were not aboute eight hundred in all, but all of them braue souldiers, and valliant men, and excellentie well trained in warres: and to conclude, such lustie men, as would incorporate all the armie Dion hoped of at his arriual in SICILIA, to fight like valliant men with them. These hyered souldiers, the first time that they vnderstoode it was to go into SICILIA, to make warre with Dionysius: they were amazed at the first, and misliked the iorney, because it was vndertaken rather of malice and spite that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrell, who hauing no better hope, tooke vpon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therefore the souldiers were offended with their Captaines that had pressed them, because they had not told them of this warre before. But after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies haue euill fundacions, & are subiect vnto ruine, & that he led them not into SICILIA so much for souldiers, as he did to make the Captaines of the SYRACVSANS, & the other SICILIANS, who of long time desired nothing more then occasion to rise. And, when after him also Alcimenus (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefeest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility & estimation) did speake vnto them in like maner, then they were all contented to goe whether they would lead

A lead them. It was then in the hart of sommer, and the wind blew called the GRÆCIAN wind, the Moone being at the full, and Dion hauing prepared to make a sumptuous sacrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corselets in procession into the temple and after the sacrifice done, he made them a feast in the parke or shewe place of the ZACYNTHIANS. There the tables were layed, and the souldiers wondred to see the great state & magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and siluer, and such other furniture and preparation, as passed a priuate mans wealth: then they thought with them selues, that a man being so olde, and Lord of so great a good, would not attempt things of such danger, without good ground, and great assurance of his friends ayde & helpe. But after his oblations of wine, and common prayers made to the gods at feasts: sodainly the Moone eclipsed. Dion thought B it not strange to see an eclipse, considering the reuolutions of the eclipses, and knowing verie well it is a shadowe that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, because of the direct interposition of the earth betwixt her and the Sunne. But because the souldiers that were affrayd and astonied withall, stood in neede of some comfort and encouragement: Miltas the Soothsayer standing vp in the middelt amongst them, sayd vnto them. My fellowe souldiers, be of good cheere, and assure your selues that we shall prosper: for God doth forefheue vs by this sight we see, that some one of the chiefeest things nowe in highest place and dignitie shall be eclipsed. And at this present time what thing carieth greater glory and fame, than the tyranny of Dionysius? Therefore you must thinke, that so soone as you arriue in SICILIA, your selues shall put out his light and glory. This interpretation of the eclipse of the Moone, did C Miltas the Soothsayer make, before all the whole companie. But touching the swarme of bees that lighted on the poope of Dions shippe, he told him, and his friends priuately: that he was affrayd his acts which should fall out famous and glorious, should last but a while, & flourishing a few dayes, would straight cōsume away. It is reported also, that Dionysius in like manner had many strange signes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle that snatched the partisan out of the souldiers handes, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the sea. The sea also beating against the walls of the castell, was as sweete to drinke a whole day together, as any condute or running water: as thole that tasted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a fowe farrowed pygges that lacked no parts of the body, but onely their eares. This the Soothsayers sayd did signifie rebellion, and disobedience of his subiects: & that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told also, that the sweetenes of the salt water prognosticated to the SYRACVSANS, chatig of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuill gouernment: and that the Eagle, Supiters minister, and the partisan, the marke and token of the kingdom and Empire, did betoken that Supiter the chiefe of all gods had determined to destroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So Dions souldiers were imbarcked into two great shippes of burden, and another third shippe that was not very great, and two pynnales with thirrye owers followed them. For their armor and weapon, beside those the souldiers had: he caried two thousand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pykes, and plenty of vittells: that they should lacke nothing all the time they were vpon the sea, considering that their iorney stood altogether at the curreisie of the windes and sea, and for that they were affrayd to lande, vnderstanding that Philistus roade at anker in the coast of APVLOTA, with a flecte of shippes that lay in wayte for their comming. So hauing a pleasant gale of wind, they sayled the space of twelue dayes together, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of SICILIA called Pachynus. There the Pilot thought it best they should land presently: for if they willingly loosed into the sea, and lost that poynt, they were sure they should lose also many nights and dayes in vaine in the middelt of the sea, being then sommer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being affrayd to land to neare his enemies, he was desirous to goe further, and so past by the foreland of Pachynus. Then the Northwind rose so bigge and great, that with great violence it drane backe their ships from the coast of SICILIA. Furthermore, F lightning and thunder mingled withall (because it was at that time when the starre Arcturus begetteth to shewe) it made so terrible a tempest, and powred downe such a sore shower of rayne vpon them, that all the Mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whether the wind would drine them: till that fodainly they saw the storme had cast them vpon the Ile of CYCYNA, (which is on the coast of LYBYA) and specially where it is most dangerous to arrive for the rocks, for their shippes were like to haue runne vpon them, and to haue made shipwrecke. But with much a doe they bare of the shippes with their great longe poles, and wandered vp and downe the sea, not knowing whether they went, vntill the storme ceased. Then they met a shippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Marriners call the heads of the great Syrt. Thus they wandering vp and downe, being marcelous angry that the sea was calme, there rose a litle South wind from the land, although they least looked for any such wind at that time, and litle thinking it would so haue chaunged: but seeing the wind rise bigger and bigger, they packed on all the sayles they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods they crossed the sea, and sayled from the coast of LYBYA, directly vnto SYCYLYE, and had the winde so lucky, that at the fift daye they were neare vnto a litle village of SYCYLYE, called

MINOA, the which was subiect to the CYRTHAGYNIANS, Synalus CYRTHAGYNIAN, being at that time Captaine and gouernor of the towne of MINOA, and Dions friende, was there by chance at that present, who being ignorant of his enterprise & comming, did what he could to keepe Dions souldiers from landing. But they notwithstanding sodainly leapt a land armed, but slue no man. For Dion had commaunded them the contrary, for the friendship he bare the Captaine: and they following the townes men hard that fled before them, entered the towne, hand ouer head amongst them, and so wanne the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had ipoken together, Dion redeliuered the towne into Synalus hands again, without any hurt or violence offered him. Synalus on the other side did indeour him selfe all he could to make much of the souldiers, and holpe Dion to provide him of all things necessary. But this did most of all encorage the souldiers, because Diomyssus at their arriual, was not then in SYCYLYE: for it chaunced so, that not many dayes before he went into ITALY, with foure score sayle. Therefore when Dion willed them to remayne there a fewe dayes to refresh them selues, because they had bene so fore sea beaten a long time together: they them selues would not, they were so glad to imbrace the occasion offered them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to SYRACVSA. Dion leauing all his superfluous armor and prouision in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to sende them to him when time serued: he tooke his way towardes SYRACVSA. So by the way, two hundred horsemen of the AGRIGENTINES, which dwell in that part called ECNOMVS, came first to ioyne with him, and after them, the GELOIANS. The rumor of their comming ranne straight to SYRACVSA. There vpon Timocrates that had married Aretè, Dions wife, and Diomyssus the fathers sister, and vnto whom Diomyssus the yonger had left the charge and gouernment of all his men and friends in the citie: he presently dispatched a post with letters, to aduertise Diomyssus of Dions comming. He him selfe also in the meane time had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutinie in the citie, though they all of them lacked no good will to rebell: but because they were vncertaine whether this rumor was true or false, being affrayd, euery man was quiet. Now there chaunced a strange misfortune vnto the Messenger, that carried the letters vnto Diomyssus. For after he had passed the straight, and that he was arriued in the citie of RHEGGIO of ITALYES side, making haste to come to the citie of CYAVLONIA, where Diomyssus was: he met by the way one of his acquaintance that carried a mutton but newly sacrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the Messenger spurred away with all the speede he could possible. But when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so weary and drowfie for lacke of sleepe, that he was driuen to lye downe. So he lay downe vpon the ground, in a wodde hard by the high way. The fauor of this fieshe brought a woulfe to him, that carried away the fieshe and the portmantew it was wrapt in, and in the which also were his letters of aduertisement, which he carried vnto Diomyssus. When he awoke out of his sleepe, and saw that his portmantew was gone: he enquired for it, and went wandering vpe and downe a long time to seeke it: howbeit all in vaine, for he could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to goe to the tyranne without his letters, but rather to flie into some vnknown place where no body knew him. Thus *F*ouerlate receiued Diomyssus aduertisement by others of this warre, which Dion made in SYCYLYE. In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came and ioyned with Dions army, in the highe way

A way towards SYRACVSA: and still there came vnto him also a great number of the SYRACVSANS that were vpe in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other side, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the castell of EPIPOLES with Timocrates, of purpose to keepe it: Vpon a false rumor Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would first goe against their townes: they forooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderstanding that, being lodged with his armie in a place called MACRE: he presently remoued his campe being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the riuer of ANAPUS, which is not from the citie about tenne furlongs off: and there staying a while, he sacrificed vnto the riuer, and made his prayer, and withorhipped the rising of the Sunne. At the selfe same instant also, the SOOTHSAYERS came and told him, that the gods did promise him assured victorie. And the souldiers also seeing Dion wear a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonie of the sacrifice: all of them with one selfe good will, tooke euery man one of them, (being no lesse then fise thousande men that were gathered together by the way, and but slenderly armed with such things as came first to hand, howbeit supplying with good will their want of better furniture and armor) and when Dion commaunded them to marche, for ioy they ranne, and incorage one another with great cries, to shew them selues valliant for recouery of their libertie. Nowe for them that were within the citie self of SYRACVSA, the noble men & chief Citizens went to receiue them at the gates in their best gownes. The common people on the other side ranne and let vpon them that tooke part with the tyranne, and spoyled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to say, the common Promoters of men) the detestable villaines, hateful to the gods and men. For they like SYCOPHANTS and busie tale bearers, would iet vp and downe the citie, and mingle amonge the Citizens, hauing an oer in euery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and buse headed, to know what euery man sayd and did, and then to goe cary it to the tyranne. These men were they that had their payment first of all, for they killed them with dry blowes, beating them to death with staues. When Timocrates could not enter into the castell with them that kept it, he tooke his horse backe, and fled out of the citie, and flying made all men affrayd and amafed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, because it should not seeme that for feare of a trifle, he had forsaken the citie. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come so neare, that they might see him plainly from the citie, marching foremost of all, armed with a fayer bright white corselet, hauing his brother Megacles on his right hande of him, & Callippus ATHENIAN on the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him also there followed a hundred souldiers that were straungers, chosen for his gard about him, and the rest came marching after in good order of batell, being led by their Captaines. The SYRACVSANS saw him comming, and went out and receiued him as a holy and blessed procession, that brought them their libertie & popular state againe, the which they had lost the space of eight and fortye years. When Dion was come into the citie by the gate called Menitide, he caused his trompeter sownd to appease the rumor and tumult of the people. Then he commaunded a Herawld to proclayme a lowd, that Dion and Megacles, who were come to put downe the tyranny, did set all the SYRACVSANS at libertie, and all the other SYCYLYENIANS also, from the bondage and subiection of the tyranne: and because Dion him selfe was desirous to speake vnto the people, he went to the vpper part of the towne called ACRADINA. The SYRACVSANS all the freeres thorough as he passed by, had on either hand of him prepared sacrifices, and fet vp tables, and cuppes vpon them: and as he passed by their houses, they cast flowers and frutes on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had bene a god. Now vnder the castell there was a place called Pentapyla, a clocke to know by the Sunne how the day went, the which Diomyssus had caused to be made, and it was of a good pretty height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perswading his contry men to doe their endeour to recouer their libertie againe, and to mainteyne it. They being in a marcelous ioy withall, and desirous to please Dion: did choofe him and his brother Megacles their Lieutenants generall, with absolute power and authoritie. Afterwards also, by the consent of Dion him selfe and his brother, and at their requestes in like manner, they chose twenty other Capitaines, of the which the most part of them had bene banished by the tyrant, and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothsayes and Prognosticators liked it well, and sayd it was a good signe for Dion, that he trooth that sumptuous building and workmanship of the tyrant vnder his feete, when he made his oration: but bicause the hande of the diall did shewe the course of the Sunne, which neuer leaueh going, vpon the which he got vppe when he was chosen Lieutenent generall with absolute power and authoritie: they were affrayd againe, that it was a signe Dions affaires should haue a sodaine change of fortune. After this, Dion hauing taken the castell of Epipoles, he set all the Citizens at libertie which were kept there as prisoners in captiuitie by the tyrant, and enuyroned the castell round about with a wall. Within seuen dayes after, Dionysius returned by sea to the castell of Syracusa, and therewithall also came the carts laden with armor and weapon to Syracusa, the which Dion had left with Synalus: the which Dion caused to be distributed amonge the Citizens of Syracusa that had none. Others did furnishe them selues as well as they could, and shewed that they had corage and good will to fight for the maintenance and defence of their libertie. In the meane time, Dionysius sent Ambassadors, first vnto Dion priuately, to see if he would yeld to any composition. But Dion would not heare them, but bad them tell the Syracvsans openly what they had to say, being men that were free, and enioyed libertie. Then the Ambassadors spake in the behalfe of the tyrant, vnto the people of Syracusa, promising them with mild and gentle wordes, that they should paye no more subsidies and taxes, but very litle, and should be no more troubled with warres, other then such as they them selues should like of. The Syracvsans made a mockery at those offers, and Dion also answered the Ambassadors, and willed Dionysius to send no more to the Syracvsans, before he had dispossessed him selfe of his tyranny: & so that he would leaue it, he would be his meane to obtayne all things iust and reasonable of the people. Dionysius liked very well of this good offer, and therefore sent his Ambassadors againe to praye the Syracvsans that they would appoynte some amongest them to come to the castell, to talke with him for the benefit and commoditie of the common wealth, that he might heare what they would alleage, and they also what answer he would make. Dion chose certaine whome he sent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the citie amonge the Syracvsans, which came from the castell: that Dionysius would willingly of him selfe, rather then by reason of Dions comming, depose him selfe of the tyrannie. But this was but a false alarom, and crafty fetch of Dionysius, to intrap the Syracvsans by. For those that were sent him from the citie, he kept them prisoners euery man of them: and one morning hauing made his souldiers drinke wine lustely, which he kept in pay to gard his person, he sent them with great furie to assault the wall the Syracvsans had built against the castell. Nowe, bicause the Syracvsans looked for nothing lesse then for the sodaine assault, and for that these barbarous people with a wonderfull corage & great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them also did set vpon the Syracvsans: there was not a man of them that durst make head to fight with them, sauing the souldiers that were strangers, whome Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noyse, ranne straight to repulse them, and yet they them selues could not well tell what they should doe vpon that sodaine. For they could heare nothing, for the great noyse and hurly burley of the Syracvsans which fled with great disorder, and came and mingled them selues amongest them. Til at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to shew them by deede what they should doe: he went first him selfe against these barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloody fight. For his enemies knewe him as well as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cries. Now for Dion him selfe, in deede bicause of his age, he was heauier then was requisite for one that should away with the paynes of such battells: but he had such a valliant corage in him, that he went thorough withall lustely, and slue them that did assaile him. Yet he had his hand also thrust thorough with a pyke, and very hardly did his curaces holde out the blowes of the darts and thrusts by hande which he receiued on them, they were so mangled and hacked with such a number of darts and pykes passed thorough his shield and broken on him, that in the ende he was beaten downe: howbeit his souldiers rescued him straight. Then he made Timonides their Capitaine, and he him selfe tooke his horse backe,

A backe, and went vp and downe the citie, slaying and quieting the flying of the Syracvsans. Then he sent for his souldiers the strangers, which he had put in garrison in that part of the citie called the Acradine to keepe it, and brought them being freshe, against the barbarous people of the castell that were wearied, and almost all of them discouraged to attempt any further enterprife. For they had made this false out, in hope to haue taken all the citie at the first onset, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectation, they met these valliant souldiers and freshe supply, they then beganne to retyre againe vnto the castell. And the Grecian souldiers on the other side, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the faster vpon them, so that they were compelled to turne their backs, and were driuen within their walls, after they had slayne three score and foureteene of Dions men, and lost a great number of their owne. This was a noble victorie and therefore the Syracvsans gaue the souldiers that were strangers, an hundred silver Minas, in reward for their good seruice: & they gaue Dion their generall, a crowne of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trompet from the castell, written from the women of his house: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed: to my father: the which Hipparimus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions sonnes name, though Timaeus writeth he was called Aretes, after his mothers name Aretia. But in such matters, me thinkes Timonides is better to be credited, bicause he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were sent, were openly red before the assembly of the Syracvsans, and did only concerne requests of these women vnto Dion. The Syracvsans would not haue the supposed letter of his sonne to be openly red: but Dion against their mindes opened it, and found that it was Dionysius letter, who by wordes, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he spake vnto the Syracvsans. For in sight, it seemed a manner of request and iustification of him selfe: but in truth, it was written of purpose to acule Dion. First of all he remembered him of the things he had done before, for the establishing and preferuation of the tyrannie: and afterwards of cruell threats against those whome he should loue best, as his wife, his sonne and sister: and last of all, full of most humble requests and intreaties with sorowe and lamentation. But that which most moued Dion of all other was, that he required him not to destroye the tyrannie, but rather to take it for him selfe, and not to set them at libertie that hated him, and would alwayes remember the mischiefe he had done vnto them: & that he would him selfe take vpon him to be Lord, sauing by that meane the liues of his parents and friends. When these letters had bene red before the whole assembly of the people, the Syracvsans thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible constancy and magnanimitie of Dion, that stood firme and fast for iustice and vertue, against such vehement intreatie and perswasion of his kinsfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be affrayd, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessitie should be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hostages he had of him. Wherefore, they began to choose them new gouernors, and the rather, bicause they heard that Heraclides was comming vnto them, whome they loued singularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had bene banished, a good souldier and Capitaine, and well esteemed of for the charge and office he bare vnder the tyrannes: howbeit a very vnconstant man in euery thing. E & would not continue long in a mind, & least constant in warres, where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in Peloponnesus, wherefore he determined to come with a power by him selfe, and with his owne fleet against the tyrant. So he arrived at length at Syracusa, with seuen gallies, and three other shippes, where he found Dionysius againe shut vp into his castell with a wall, and the Syracvsans also to haue the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauor with the common people all the wayes he could possibly deuise, hauing by nature a certaine pleasing manner to winne the common people, which seeke nothing els but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to winne them, bicause the people did already mislike Dions seueritie, as a man too seuer and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will so much, and were growen so strong headed, bicause they sawe them selues the stronger: that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they onely be Lordes, and doe rule) before they were fully set at libertie. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authoritie, of the gouernors: they all ranne in a furey, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of com-complane of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to giue this power him, to sue to the people, & to contend for honor against him in so dangerous a tyme, when the least occasion in the world was enough to haue marred all. Afterwards Dion him selfe called an assembly againe of the citie, and established Heraclides Admirall: and perfwaded the Citizens to giue him souldiers, as he had in deede. Heraclides outwardly seemed to honor Dion, and confessed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alway at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commaundement: but in the meane time, secretly he inticed the common people to rebell, & to stirre vp those whom he knew meete men to like of change.

Whereby he procured Dion such trouble, and brought him into such perplexitie, that he knew not well what way to take. For if he gaue them aduise to let Dionysius quietly come out of the castell: then they accused him, and sayd he did it to faue his life. If on the other side, bi-cause he would not trouble them, he continued seeger still, and did establish nothing: then they thought he did it of purpose to draw out the warres in length, bicause he might the lengger time remaine their chiefeitaine generall, and so to keepe the Citizens longer in feare. At that time there was one Sofis in SYRACVS, a man of no name, but noted amongst the SYRAC-VSANS for his villany and wickednes, esteeming that full and ample libertie, when he might vnchecked licentiously speake what he would, as in deede he did. For he seeking to doe Dion a displeasure: first of all one day at a common counsell he stode vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beastes, (amongest many other vile wordes he gaue them) if they did not per-ceiue, that being come from a fond and droncken tyrannie, they had nowe receiued a sober master, and a wife and ware tyranne. So when he had thus openly shewed him selfe an enemy vnto Dion, he came no more that daye into the market place: but the next morning he was seene ronning vp and downe the citie naked, his head and face all of a gore bloud, as if he had bene followed by men to haue slayne him. Thus Sofis comming in this manner into the middest of the market place, cryed out, that Dions straungers had lye in wayte for him, and had handled him in this sort, shewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuouly, and cried out vpon Dion, and sayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him: by feare of murder and daunger, to take away the libertie from the Citizens to speake.
Nowe though the whole assembly hercupon fell into an vpror withall, Dion notwithstanding came thither to cleare him selfe of these accusations, and made them presently see, that this Sofis was brother to one of Dionysius gard: who had put into his head, in this sort to put the citie of SYRACVS in an vpror, bicause Dionysius had no other hope nor meanes to escape, but by stirring vp faction and sedition amongst them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgiens were sent for forthwith to searche the wounde of this Sofis: who founde that it was rather a litle scratche, then any violent wound giuen him. For the woundes or cuts of a sword, are euer deepest in the middelt: and Sofis cut was but very litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, and giuen him (as it seemed) at sundry times, that for very paine, the party that cut him was driuen to leaue of, & so came to cut him at diuers times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a raser before the assembly, and reported that as they came, they met Sofis by the way all bloudied: who sayd, that he fled from Dions souldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they presently followed them, but found no man, and onely they saw a raser, which some bodye had cast vpon a hollow stone thereabout, where they first saw him comming vnto them. Thus Sofis de-uise had but euill successe. For beside all these proofes and tokens, Dions household seruants came to be a witness against him: that very earely in the morning he went abroad alone with a raser in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuse Dion, knewe not what to say

A the matter, but shroncke away: whereupon the people condēning Sofis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies afraid of these souldiers that were straungers, specially when they saw the greatest conflicts they had with the tyranne, was by sea, after that Philistius was come from the coast of AVGVLIA with a great number of gallies to ayde the ty-ranne. For then they thought, that these souldiers the straungers being armed at all partes to fight by land, they would do them no more seruice by sea: bicause the Citizens them selues were they that kept them in safetie, for that they were men practised to fight by sea, and were also the stronger by meanes of their ships. But beside all this, the onely thing that made them to be coragious againe, was the good fortune they had at the battel by sea, in the which when they had ouercome Philistius, they cruelly and barbarously vled him. Truly Ephorus saith, that Philistius slue him selfe, when he sawe his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the first beginning of this warre) writing vnto Speusippus the Philosopher, saith that Philistius was taken aliue, bicause his galley ranne a land: and that the SYRACVSANS first tooke of his curaces, and stripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villanie and spight they could, they cut of his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commaunding them to dragge it into that part of the citie called ACRADINE, and then to cast it into the common priue. Timaeus also to spight him the more, sayth that the boyes tyed the deade bodye by his lame legge, and so dragged him vp and downe the citie, where all the SYRACVSANS did what villanie to it they could, being glad to see him dragged by the legge, that had sayd Dionysius should not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horse, but that they should pull him out by the legge against his will. Now Philistius reporteth this matter thus, not as spoken to Dionysius by him selfe, but by some other. But Timaeus taking a iust occasion and culler to speake euil of the good will, fidelitie, and care that Philistius had alwayes seemed to shew in the confirmation & defence of the tyrannie: doth liberally bestow iniurious wordes on him in this place. Nowe for them whome he had in deede offended, if they of malice and spight to be reuenged, did offer him crueltie, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that since his death haue written the icafts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shewe them selues discrete in their writing, me thinks that if they had regarded their owne credit and estimation, they should not so fondly and outrageously haue reproved the aduersities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chaunce to the honestest man, as vnto him. Thus fondely doth Ephorus prayse Philistius, who though he haue an excellent fine wit to counterfeite goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dishonest partes, and eloquently to deuise by honest words to defend an euill cause: yet can not he with all the fine wits he hath excuse him selfe, that he hath not bene the onely man of the world that hath most fauored tyrannes, and that hath euer loued, and specially desired power, wealth, and alliance with tyrannes. But he in my opinion taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that neither doth commend Philistius doings, nor yet casteth his aduersities in his teeth to his reproche. After Philistius death, Dionysius sent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the castell, armor, munition, and souldiers that were in it, with money also to paye them for five monethes space. For him selfe, he prayed that he might be suffered to goe safely into TRA-E LY, and to lye there, to take the pleasure of the fruites of the contry called GYRTA, which was within the territorie of SYRACVS, and lyeth out from the sea towards the mayne land. Dion refused this offer, and answered the Ambassadors that they must moue the SYRACVSANS since they supposing they should easily take Dionysius aliue, would not heare the Ambassadors speake, but turned them away. Dionysius seeing no other remedie, left the castell in the handes of his eldest sonne Apollocrates, and hauing a lusty gale of winde, he secretly imbarcked certaine of his men he loued best, with the richest thinges he had, and so hoysed sayle, vnto to Heraclides, the Admirall of SYRACVS. The people were maruelously offended with Heraclides for it, and beganne to murine against him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the people, suborned one Hippion an Orator, who preferred the lawe Agraria vnto the people, for the diuision of all the lland amongst them: and that the beginning of libertie was equalitie, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no landes. Heraclides giuing his consent to this decree, and stirring the common people to sedition against Dion, that with stode it: perfw-

ded the SYRACVSANS not onely to confirme the lawe Hippon had propounded, but also to discharge the hyered strangers, to chooſe other Captaines and gouernors, and to rid them ſclues of Dions leuere gouernement. But they ſuppoſing ſtraight to haue bene rid from the tyranny as from a long and grievous ſicknes, ouerhaſty taking vpon them like people that of long time had bene at libertie, they vterly vndid them ſclues, and ouerthrew Dions purpoſe: who like a good Phiſition was carefull to ſee the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were aſſembled to chooſe new officers in the middeſt of ſommer, there fel ſuch horrible thunders, and other terrible ſtormes, & vnfortunate ſignes in the element, that for the ſpace of fiſteene dayes together, the people were ſtil ſcattered and diſperſed when they were aſſembled: in ſomuch, that being affraide of theſe ſignes about, they durſt not at that time create any new Captaines. Certaine dayes after, as the Orators had choſen a fayer time to proceede to the election of officers: an ox drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with euery ſight and noyſe) ſodainly without any occaſion offered, fell into a madnes againſt the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke aſonder, ranne ſtraight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into euery corner, to flye and ſaue them ſclues: and then ſinging, and bearing all downe before him that ſtoode in his way, he ranne through as much of the citie, as the enemies afterwards wanne of them. This notwithstanding, the SYRACVSANS making light account of all theſe ſignes, they choſe ſiue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and ſecretly they ſent to feele the hired ſouldiers, to ſee if they could entice them from Dion, to cauſe them to take their part, and made them large promiſes to make them free men, as them ſclues of SYRACVSA. The ſouldiers would not be enticed from him, but faithfully & louingly tooke Dion amongſt them with their armor and weapon, and putting him in the middeſt of them, led him in this manner out of the citie, and did no man hurt, but reprobuing their vnthankfulnes and villanie vnto all thoſe they met by the way. Then the SYRACVSANS deſpiſing them for their ſmal number, & becauſe they did not firſt ſer vpon them, but truſting on the other ſide to them ſclues for that they were the greater number: they came to aſſaile them, ſuppoſing that they ſhould eaſily ouercome them in the citie, & kil euery man of them. Dion being thus at a ſtraight, that of neceſſitie he muſt fight againſt his owne contry men, or els be ſlaine him ſelfe with his ſouldiers: he held vp his hands to the SYRACVSANS & very earneſtly praied them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the caſtell that was full of their enemies, which ſhewed them ſclues vpon the wals, & ſaw what they did. In the ende, when he ſaw that he could not pacifie their furie & tumult, and that all the citie was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of theſe ſeditious people, who like the ſea were caried with the wind: he did yet forbid his ſouldiers to giue any charge vpon them, who notwithstanding made a countenance with great cryes, and rating of their harmes, as if they had ment to runne on them. Then the SYRACVSANS durſt not abide by it, but ranne away like ſheepe through the ſtreets, & no man chafed them. So Dion called backe his men againe, & led them directly into the cōtry of the LEONTINES. The new officers & gouernors of SYRACVSA, perceiuing that the women laughed them to ſcorne: becauſe they would recouer the ſhame they had loſt, they armed their men a new againe, & did marche after Dion to fight with him, whome they out-tooke at a riuier, as he was ready to paſſe ouer. Then began their horſemen a litle to ſkirmiſh with Dions company. But when they ſaw he did no more beare with their faults for contries ſake, but frowned in deede vpon them, & did ſet his men in battel ray againſt them: then they turned their backs againe, with more ſhame and reproache then before, and ſo fled vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, & had not many of their men ſlaine. The LEONTINES receiued Dion very honorably, tooke the ſtrangers his ſouldiers, and gaue them pay, & made them free Citizens with them: & ſent Ambaſſadors alſo vnto the SYRACVSANS, to wil them to let the ſtrangers haue their pay. The SYRACVSANS on their ſide alſo, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the LEONTINES to accuſe Dion. So all their confederats were aſſembled in the citie of the LEONTINES, & in that aſſembly, after both parties had bene heard, to heare what they would ſay: it was iudged that the SYRACVSANS were to blame. Howbeit they would not ſtand to the iudgement of their confederats, for they were now growen proud & careleſe, becauſe they were gouerned by no man, but had Captaines that ſtudied to pleaſe them, & were affraid alſo to diſpleaſe them.

After

A After that, there arrived certain gallies of Dionysius, at SYRACVSA, of the which, Nypſius Napolitan was captaine: which brought vittels & money, to help the that were beleiged with in the caſtel. Theſe gallies were fought with, & the SYRACVSANS obtained victorie, and tooke foure of the tyrannes gallies with three bankes of owes a peece: howbeit they fondly abuſed their victorie. For they hauing no body to command nor rule them, employed all their ioy, in ryoting and banquetting, and in fond and diſſolute meetings, taking ſo litle care and regard to their buſines, that now when they thought the caſtel was ſure their owne, they almoſt loſt their citie. For Nypſius perceiuing that euery part of the citie was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but bybbe and drinke drunke, dauncing after their pytes and howboyes, and that the gouernors them ſclues were very glad alſo to ſee ſuch feaſting, or els for that they diſsembled it, and durſt not command and compell them that were droncke: he wiſely tooke the occaſion offered him, and ſcaled the wall which had ſhut vp the caſtell, and wanne it, and ouerthrew it. Then he ſent the barbarous ſouldiers into the citie, and commanded them to doe with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACVSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue preſent remedie, they were ſo amazed and ſodainly ſet on: for in deede they made a right ſacke of the citie. Here men were killed, there they ouerthrew the wall, in another place they caried away women and litle children priſoners into the caſtel, weeping and crying out: and laſtly, they made the Captaines at their wits ende, who could giue no preſent order, nor haue their men to ſerue them againſt their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euery ſide amongſt them. The citie being thus miſerably in garboyle, and the ACRAIDINE alſo in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to riſe againe: euery man thought then with him ſelfe that Dion muſt be ſent for, but yet no man moued it notwithstanding, being aſhamed of their vnthankfulnes and ouergreat folly they had committed, in driuing him away. Yet neceſſitie enforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horſemen and of their confederats that cryed, they muſt ſend for Dion, and the PELOPONNESIANS his ſouldiers, which were with him in the territorie of the LEONTINES. Aſſoone as the firſt worde was heard, and that one had the hart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACVSANS cryed out, there was the poynt: and they were ſo glad of it, that the water ſtoode in their eyes for ioy, and beſought the gods it would pleaſe them to bringe him vnto them, they were ſo deſirous to haue him againe. For they called to minde howe valliant and reſolute he was in daunger, and how that he was neuer affrayde, but did encourage them with his manhood in ſuch ſort, that being led by him, they were not affrayd to ſet vpon their enemies. So the confederats for them, ſent preſently Archonides and Teleſides vnto him: and the noble men that ſerued on horſebacke, they ſent him alſo ſiue amongſt them, beſide Hellanicus. Who tooke their horſes, and poſted for life, ſo that they came to the citie of the LEONTINES about Sunne ſet, and lighting from their horſes, they went firſt of all and kneeled downe at Dions ſeate, and weeping, tolde him the miſerable ſtate of the SYRACVSANS. Straight there came diuers of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN ſouldiers vnto Dion, miſtruſting then that there was ſome newes in hand, to ſee the earneſt and humble ſure the Ambaſſadors of SYRACVSA made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them preſently with him, and brought them him ſelfe vnto the Theater, where the common counſells and aſſemblies of the citie were holden. Thither ranne euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, tolde openly before the whole aſſembly, the greates of their miſerie, and requelled the hyered ſouldiers to come and ayde the SYRACVSANS, forgetting the iniurie they had receiued: conſidering that they had more dearely payd for their follye, then they them ſclues whome they had ſo iniured, would haue made them to haue ſuffered. When they had ſayd their mindes, there was a great ſilence through all the Theater: and then Dion roſe vp, and beganne to ſpeake. But the great teares that fell from his eyes would not ſuffer him to ſpeake: wherefore the hyered ſouldiers being for to ſee him weepe, prayed him not to trouble him ſelfe, but to be of good corage. Then Dion letting goe the ſorowe and griefe he had conceiued, he beganne to ſpeake vnto them in this manner. My Lordes of PELOPONNESVS, and you alſo the confederats: I haue called you together to consult with you, what you should doe. For my selfe, it were no honestly for me to consult what I should do now, when the city of SYRACUSA standeth in perill of destruction: & therefore if I can not saue it from destruction, yet at the least I will bury my selfe in the fire and ruine of my contry. But for you, if it please you once more to helpe vs, vnaduised & more vnfortunate people: you shal by your meanes let the poore distressed city of SYRACUSA againe a foote, which is your deede. Or if it be so, that remembreing the iniuries the SYRACUSANS haue offered you, you wil suffer it to be destroyed: yet I beseech the gods that at the least they will requite your valliantnes, fidelity, & good loue you haue borne me vntill this present, beseeching you to remeber Dion, who nether forsooke you at any time when you haue bene iniured, nor his cōtry men, when they were in trouble. So, going on stil with his tale, the mercenary strangers stepped forth with great noise, & praised him to leade them to ayde SYRACUSA. Then the Ambassadors also that were sent from the SYRACUSANS, saluted & embraced them, & prayed the gods to blesse Dion & them, with al the good hap that might be. So when al was whist & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to goe & prepare them selues, & that they should be there ready armed after supper, determining the very same night to go to aide SYRACUSA. But now at SYRACUSA, while day light lasted, Dionysius souldiers & captaines did al the mischief & villany they could in the city: & when night came, they retired againe into their castel, hauing lost very few of their men. Then the seditious gouernours of the SYRACUSANS tooke hart againe vnto them, hoping that the enemies would be contented with that they had done: & therefore began a new to perswade the citizens to let Dion alone, & not to receiue him with his mercenary souldiers if they came to aide him, saying, that they them selues were honest men then the Ambassadors were sent againe vnto Dion, some from the captaines & gouernours of the city, to stay them that they should not come: & others also from the horsemen, & noble Citizens his friends to haste his iorney. Whereupp by reason of this variance, Dion marched very softly at his ease. Now by night, Dions enemies within the city got to the gates, & kept thē that Dion should not come in. Nyffius on the other side made a sally out of the castel with his mercenary souldiers, being better appointed, & a greater nūber of thē then before: & with thē he straight plucked downe all the wal which they had built before the castel, & ran & sacked the city. At this sally out of the castel, they did not only kill the men they met, but women & litle children also, & staid no more to spoile, but to destroy & put all to hauock. For, because Dionysius saw that he was brought to a straight & desperat case, he bare such mortal malice against the SYRACUSANS, that sith there was no remedy but that he must needs forgo his tyranny: he determined to burye it, with the vter destruction & desolation of their citie. And therefore, to preuent Dion:s ayde, & to make a quick dispatch to destroy all: they came with burning torches in their hands, & did set fire of all things they could come to: & further of, they fiered their darts & arrowes, & bestowed them in euery place of the city. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, & slayne in the streetes by the souldiers, and others also that ranne into their houses, were driuen out againe by force of fire. For there were a number of houses that were afire, and fel downe vpon them that went and came. This misery was the chiefeft cause why all the SYRACUSANS agreed together, to set open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionysius souldiers were gone againe into the castell, he made no great haste to marche forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horsemen from SYRACUSA vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the city. Then also came other of his enemies vnto him, and prayed him to make haste. Now their miserie increasing still, and they being brought into hard state: Heraclides first sent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his Vncle, to pray him to come quickly, & helpe them. For now there was no man left to resist the enemies, because he him selfe was hurt, and the citie also was in manner cleane burnt & destroyed. VVhen these newes came to Dion, he was yet about three score surlong from the towne. So he told his mercenary souldiers the danger the towne was in, & hauing encouraged them, he led them no more fayer & softly, but running towards the city, & meeting Messengers one of anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the possible speede he could. By this meanes, the souldiers marching with wonderful speede & good will

A together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called HECATOMPEDON. First of all, he sent the lightest armed he had, against the enemies, to thende that the SYRACUSANS seeing them, they might take a good hart againe to them: whilest he himself in the meane time did let al the other heavy armed souldiers and Citizens that came to ioyne with him, in battell raye, & did cast them into diuers squadrons, of greater length then breadth, & appointed them that should haue the leading of them, to thend that letting vpon the enemies in diuers places together, they should put them in the greater feare & terror. VVhen he had let all things in this order, & had made his prayers vnto the gods, & that they saw him marching through the citie against their enemies: then there rose such a common noyse & reioicing, & great shrowre of the souldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, and perswasions of all the SYRACUSANS: that they called Dion their god & sauior, & the mercenary souldiers their brethren & fellow Citizens. Furthermore, there was not a SYRACUSAN that so much regarded his owne life & person, but he seemed to be more affraid of the losse of Dion only, then of all the rest. For they saw him the foremost man running through the dainger of the fire, treading in blood, & vpon dead bodies that lay slaine in the midst of the streets. Now, in deede to charge the enemies, it was a maruelous dangerous enterprise: for they were like mad beasts, & stood beside in battell ray alongst the wal which they had ouerthrowen, in a very dangerous place, & hard to win. Howbeit the daunger of the fire did most of all trouble & amaze the straungers, & did stoppe their way. For, on which side soeuer they turned them, the houses round about them were all of a fire, and they were driuen to marche ouer the burnt timber of the houses, and to runne in great daunger of the walls of the house sides that fell on them, & to passe through the thicke smoke mingled with dust, & beside, to keepe their ranks with great difficultie. And whē they came to assaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, because of the straightnes of the place: howbeit the SYRACUSANS with force of cries & shoutes did so animat, & encourage their men, that at length they draue Nyffius & his men to forsake the place. The most part of them gor into the castell, being very neare vnto them the other that could not get in in time, fled itraglingly vp and downe, whom the GRÆCIAN souldiers slue, chasing of them. The extremitie of the time did not presently suffer the Conquerors to reape the frute of their victory, neither the ioyes & embracing meete for so great an exployte. For the SYRACUSANS went euery man home to his owne house, to quench the fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night. VVhen daye brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tary in the citie, but cōdemning them selues, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotes came together of their owne good wills to yeld them selues vnto Dion, confessing that they had done him wronge, and humbly praying him to shew him selfe better vnto them, then they had shewed them selues vnto him: & that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmatchable for his vertues, to shew him selfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confesse themselves to be farre inferior vnto him. This was the summe & effect of Heraclides & Theodotes submission vnto Dion. But his friends did perswade him not to pardon two such wicked men, who did malice & enuy his honor: and as he would doe the straungers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraclides into their hands, to roote out of the common wealth of SYRACUSA, his vile manner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as dangerous and great a plague to a citie, as the tyranny. Dion pacifying them, answered, Other generals of armies, said he, do imploy al their wits in marshall exercise & warres: but for him selfe, that he had of long time studied, & learned in the schole of the Academy, to ouercome anger, enuy, & all malice & contention. The noble prooffe whereof is most seene, not in vsing honest men and his friends moderately, but shewing mercy also vnto his enemies, & forgetting his anger against them that haue offended him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wisdom, but in clemency & iustice, for therein chiefly consisted excellencie, sith no man els in warres can challenge power & government, but fortune, that ruleth most. And though Heraclides sayd he, through enuy hath done like a wicked man: must Dion therefore through anger bleamish his vertue? In deede by mans law it is thought meeter, to reuenge an iniurie offered, then to

 " though it be a hard thing to chaunge and alter the euill disposition of a man, after he is once " nuseled in villany: yet is not man of so wild & brutish a nature, that his wickednes may not be " ouercome with often pleasures, when he seeth that they are continually shewed him. Dion an" swering his friends thus, he forgave Heraclides, & beginning againe to shut vp the castell with a wall round about, he commaunded the SYRACVSANS euery man of them to cut downe a stake, & to bringe it thither. So, when night was come, setting his souldiers the straungers in hand withall, whilest the SYRACVSANS slept & tooke their ease: by morning he had compassed the castell round about with a pale. The next day, they that saw the greatnes & sodaine expedition of this worke, wondred much at it, as wel the enemies, as also the Citizens: & when he had buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken prisoners, (which were not much B lesse then two thousand persons) he called a common counsell of the citie, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion should be chosen general of SYRACVSA, with absolute power & authoritie, both by sea & land. The chiefeest men of the citie liked very well of it, and would haue had the people to haue past it. But the rabble of these mariners, and other mechanical people liuing by their labor, would not suffer Heraclides to be put from his Admirallship, but tel to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleasure els, yet he would euer be a more popular man then Dion, & please the common people better. Dion gaunted their desire, & made Heraclides Admirall againe of the sea: howbeit he did anger them as much an other way, whē he did not only reiect the earnest sute they made to haue the law Agraria passe for diuision of lands in equalitie amongst them, but did also cancel & reuoke all that had been done before. Wherefore Heraclides remaining at MESSINA, began thenceforth to enter into new practises againe, & to flatter the souldiers & sea fairing men he had brought thither with him, & to stirre them vp to rebel against Dion, saying, that he would make him selfe tyrannicall: & him selfe in the meane time secretly practised with Dionysius, by meanes of a SPARTAN called Pharax. The noblest men of the SYRACVSANS mistrusted it, & thereupon there fell out great mutinie in their campe, whereby also followed great famine in SYRACVSA: so that Dion was at such a straight, that he could not tell what to say to it, & was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authoritie against him selfe, so vntractable a man, & so malicious & wicked a person as Heraclides was. Now, when Pharax laye in campe with an army neare vnto the citie of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES: Dion did bringe D the army of the SYRACVSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till another time. But through Heraclides, & the sea mens crying out, that said he would not try this warre by bartell, but would draw it out in length bicause he would be still generall: he was forced to giue bartell, and lost it. Howbeit the ouerthrow was not great, and happened rather bi-cause his men were at a iarre among them selues, by reason of their faction and diuision, then otherwise. Dion therefore prepared to fight another bartell, and gathered his men together againe, incoring them, when euen at twilight word was brought him that Heraclides with all his flecte was vnder saile towards SYRACVSA, meaning to take the citie, & to shut Dion & his army out of it. Wherefore he presently tooke with him the chiefeest men of authoritie in the citie, and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were E at the gates of SYRACVSA the next morning by nyne of the clocke, hauing ridden feuen hundred furlong. Heraclides that had sayled with all the possible speede he could to prevent him with his shippes, perceiuing that he came short, he turned saile, and taking seas at all aduenture, by chance he met with Gefilus LACEDÆMONIAN, who tolde him he was sent from LA-CEDÆMON, to be general to the SICILIANS in this warre, as Gylippus was sent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him, to haue such a remedy and defence against Dion, & boasted of it vnto the friends & confederats of SYRACVSA, and sent a Herald before vnto the SYRACVSANS, sumoning them to receiue Gefilus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was sent to be their general. Dion made answer, that the SYRACVSANS had gouernors enow, & though that their assayres did of necessitie require a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine, yet that him selfe was he, for F that he was made free in SPARTA. The Gefilus perceiuing he could not obtaine to be general, he went vnto SYRACVSA, & came to Dion, & there made Heraclides & him friends againe, by

A the great and solemne othes he made: & bicause Gefilus also sware, that he him selfe would be reuenged of him for Dions sake, & punishe Heraclides, if euer after he did once more conspire against him. After that, the SYRACVSANS brake vp their army by sea, bicause it did them then no seruice, and was beside chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breede sedition and trouble amongst their gouernors: and so went to lay straighter siege to the castell then euer they did, and built vp the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowen. Then Dionysius sonne seeing no aide to come to him from any parte, and that vittels failed them, and further, that the souldiers began to mutine, being vnable to keepe them: he fel to a composition with Dion, and deliuered vp the castell into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it: and so tooke his mother & his sisters of Dion, and put them aboard vpon fūe galleies, with the which B he went vnto his father, through the safe conduit of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACVSA, but was there to see this sight, or if by chance there were any absent, the other that were there called them thither as lowde as they could crie, saying, that they did not see the goodliest day and sunne shine, which the citie of SYRACVSA might see then at her rising, the same being now restored againe to her former libertie. If vntill this present day they doe reckon the flying of Dionysius, for one of the rarest examples of fortunes change, as one of the greatest & notablest thing that euer was: what ioi thinke we had they that draue him out, & what pleasure had they with them selues, that with the least meane that could be possible, did destroy the greatest tyrannie in the world? So, when Apollocrates Dionysius sonne was imbarcked, and that Dion was entred into the castell: the women within the castell would not C tary till he came into the house, but went to meete him at the gates, Aristomaché leading Dions sonne in her hand, and Areta following her weeping, being verie fearefull how she should call and salute her husband, hauing lyen with an other man. Dion first spake to his sister, and afterwards to his sonne: and then Aristomaché offering him Areta, said vnto him. Since thy banishment, O Dion, we haue led a miserable and captiue life: but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou hast ridde vs out of care and thralldom, and hast also made vs againe bolde to lift vp our heads, fairing her here, whom I wretched creature haue by force (thy selfe aliue) seene married vnto an other man. Now then, fith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what iudgement giuest thou of this compulsion? Howe wilt thou haue her to salute thee, as her Vncle, or husbände? As Aristomaché spake these wordes, the water stood in Dions eyes: so, D he gently and louingly taking his wife Areta by the hand, he gaue her his sonne, and willed her to goe home to his house where he then remained, and so deliuered the castell to the SYR-ACVSANS. He hauing this prosperous successe and victorie, would not reape any present benefite or pleasure thereby, before he had shewed him selfe thankfull to his friends, geuen great gifts also vnto the confederats of SYRACVSA, and speciallie, before he had geuen euerie one of his friends in the citie, and his mercenarie souldiers the straungers, some honorable reward according to their deserts, exceeding his abilitie with magnanimitie of minde: when he him selfe liued soberly, and kept a moderate dyet, contenting him with any thing that came first to hand. Euery man that heard of it, wondered at him, considering that not only all SICILIA and CARTHAGE, but generallie all GRÆCE looked vpon his great prosperitie and good fortune, thinking no man liuing greater then him selfe, nor that any Captaine euer attained to such fame and wonderfull fortune, as he was come vnto. This notwithstanding, Dion liued as temperately and modestly in his apparell, and also in his number of seruantes, and seruice at his bord, as if he had liued with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not bene conuersant amongst souldiers and Captaines, which haue no other comfort nor pleasure for all the paines and daungers they suffer continuallie, but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleasure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no respect but to one place, and to one citie (to wit, the Academy) and would haue no other Iudges nor lookers into his doings, but the schollers of the same: who neither wondered at his great employtes, valliantnes, nor victorie, but only considered if he F did wiselie and modestly vse this fortune he had, and could so keepe him selfe within modest boundes, hauing done so great things. Furthermore, touching the graetie he had when he spake to any bodie, and his inflexible feueritie which he vsed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or chaunge it: notwithstanding that his affaires required him to shew cunctie and lenitie, and that Plato also reprov'd him for it, and wrote, that feueritie and obstinacie (as we sayd before) was the companion of solitarie. But it seemeth to me that Dion did vie it for two respects. The first, because nature had not framed him courteous and affable to winne men: secondly, he did what he could to drawe the SYRACUSANS to the contrarie, who were ouerlicentious, & spoyleth with too much flattery: for Heraclides began againe to be busie with him. First of all, Dion sending for him to come to counsell, he sent him word he would not come: and that being a priuate citizen, he would be at the common counsell amongst others when any was kept. Afterwards he accused him, for that he had not ouerthrowen and raised the castell: and also because he would not suffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionysius the elder, to cast out his bodie: & because he sent for counsellors to CORINTH, and disdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the common wealth. In deede to confesse a troth, Dion had sent for certaine CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to stablish the forme of a common wealth, which he had in his minde, when they were come. For his minde was vtterly to breake the gouernment of Democratie, (to wit, the absolute gouernment and authoritie of the people in a cite, not being as it was a common wealth, but rather a fayre and market where things are solde, as Plato sayth) and to stablish the LACONIAN or CRETAN common wealth, mingled with a Princely, and popular gouernment: & that should be, Aristocratie, to wit, the number of a fewe noble men that shoulde gouerne and direct the chiefeest and weightiest matters of state. And for that purpose, he thought the CORINTHIANS the meetest men to help him to frame this comon wealth, considering that they gouerned their affaires more by choosing a few number of the nobilitie, then otherwise, and that they did not refferre many things to the voyce of the people. And because he was assured that Heraclides would be against him in all that he could, and that otherwise he knewe he was a seditious, a troublefome, and light headed fellow: he then suffered them to kill him who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it, & so they went home to his house, and slue him there. The murder of Heraclides was much misliked of the SYRACUSANS: shewbeit Dion caused him to be honorable buried, and brought his bodie to the grounde, followed with all his armie. Then he made an Oration him selfe to the people, and told them, that it was impossible to auoyde sedition and trouble in the cite, so long as Dion and Heraclides did both gouerne together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato sayth) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his studie in Philosophie: but because he had bene his guide to bring him to see the secret misteries and ceremonies of the sacrifices, and for such other like common talke and companie. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accompanie him in all this warre, and was verie much honored of him, and was one of the first of all his frendes that entred into SYRACUSA with him, and did valliantlie behaue him selfe in all the battells and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus seeing that Dions best & chiefeest frends were all slaine in this warre, & that Heraclides also was dead, that the people of SYRACUSA had no more any heade, and besides, that the souldiers which were with Dion did loue him better than any other man: he became the vnfaithfullest man and the veriest villan of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he should vndoubtedly come to haue the whole gouernment of all SICILIA, and as some doe reporte, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies of twentie talentes for his labor to commit this murder. So he began to practise, to bribe, and to subborne certaine of the mercenarie souldiers against Dion, and that by a maruelous craftie and furtle fetch. For, vsing commonly to report vnto Dion certaine seditious wordes, spoken peraduenture by the souldiers in deede, or else deuised of his owne head: he wan such a libertie and boldnes by the trust Dion had in him, that he might safely say what he would to any of the souldiers, and boldly speake euill of Dion by his owne commaundement: to tend he might thereby vnderstand the better whether any of the souldiers were angry with him, or wished his death. By this pollicie, Callippus straight found out those that bare Dion grudge, & that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his conspiracy. And if any man vnwilling to geue care vnto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus would haue inticed him to conspire against him: Dion was not angrie with him for it, thinking that he did, but as he had A commaunded him to doe. Now as this treason was practising against Dion, there appeared a great and monstrous ghost or spirit vnto him. By chance sitting late one euening all alone, in a gallerie he had, and being in a deepe thought with him selfe, suddenly he heard a noyse: and therewith casting his eye to thend of his gallery, (being yet day light) he saw a monstrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies shewed in plays, and saw her sweeping of the house with a broome. This vision so amazed and affrighted him, that he sent for his frends, and told them what a sight he had seene: and prayed them to tarie with him all night, being as it were a man beside him selfe, fearing least the spirit would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithstanding he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit shortly after, his sonne being growen to mans state, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he cast him selfe hedlong downe from the toppes of the house, and so was slaine. Dion being in this state, Callippus went on still with his treason, and spread a rumor abroad among the SYRACUSANS, that Dion seeing him selfe nowe destitute of children, was determined to send for Apollocrates, Dionysius sonne, to make him his heire and successor, being cousin germaine to his wife, and his sisters daughters sonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and sister to mistrust Callippus practises, and they were told of it by diuers fundrie and manifest proofes. But Dion being forie (as I suppose) for Heraclides death, and inwardlie taking that murder in very euill part, as a fowle blot to his life and doings: he sayd he had rather dye a thousand deaths, and to offer his throat to be cut to any that would, rather then he would lue in that miserie, to be compelled to take heede as well of his frends, as of his enemies. Callippus then seeing the women so busie and inquisitiue of his doings, & fearing least he should be beyrayed: he came weeping vnto them, and told them it was nothing, and that he was ready to assure them of it by any maner of way they would deuise. The women then willed him to sweare by the great othe, which was in this maner. He that must take this othe, cometh into the temple of the goddesses Thesmophores, which are, Ceres and Proserpina. And after certaine sacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddesse Proserpina, holding a burning torch in his hand and sweareth in this maner. Callippus hauing done all these ceremonies, and made the oth in forme as I haue told you: he made fo light accompt of the goddesses, that he taried no longer to do the murder he had determined, but till the very feast day of the goddesse should come, by whom he had sworne: and slue him on the day of the feast of Proserpina. Nowe, I doe not thinke that he chose that day of sette purpose, knowing right well that he did alwayes sinne against her, what time foueuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes speciallie admitted to the societie and brotherhoode with him, of the fraternity and misteries of Ceres & Proserpina. Of this conspiracie there were diuers. For as Dion was set in his chamber talking with his frends where there were many beddes to sit on: some compassed the house round about, others came to the dores and windowes of his chamber, and they that should doe the deede to dispatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN souldiers, came into his chamber in their coates without any sword. But when they were come in, they that were without did shut the dores after them, and locked them in, least any man shoulde come out: and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue strangled him. But when they saw they could not, they called for a sword. Neuer a man that was within, durst open the dores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought euery man to saue their owne liues, by suffering him to be killed, and therefore durst not come to helpe him. So the murderers taried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycan a SYRACUSAN, that gaue one of these ZACYNTHIAN souldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throat, as a weather they had holden a long time in their handes, euen dead for feare. The murder being executed, they cast his sister, and wife, great with childe, into prison, and there the poore Ladie was pitiefullie brought to bedde of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwise to doe any thing with the childe. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, because Callippus began then a litle to grow to some trouble. For at the first, after he had slaine Dion, he bare all the whole sway for a time, and kept the cite of SYRACUSA in his hands: & wrote vnto ATHENS, the which next vnto the immortal goddess he was most affrayed of, hauing defiled his handes in so damnable a treason. therefore, in my opinion, it was not euill spoken, that ATHENS is a citie of all other that bringeth forth the best men when they geue them selues to goodnes, & the wickedest people also, when they doe dispose them selues to euill: as their contrie also bringeth forth the best honnie that is, and hemlocke in like maner that quickly dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit the gods, and fortune, did not suffer this treason and wicked man to raigne long, hauing comen to the gouernment of a realme by so damnable a murder: but shortly after they gaue him his payment he had deserued. For Callippus going to take a litle towne called CATANA, he lost the citie of SYRACUSA: whereupon he sayd that he had lost a citie, and got a cheefe-knife. Afterwards he went to assaile the MESSENIANS, and there he lost a great number of his men, and amongst them were slaine those that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no citie in all SICILIA, that woulde receiue him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him: he went to take the citie of RHEGIO in ITALIE. There being in great distresse and neede of all thinges, and not able to maintaine his souldiers: he was slaine by Leptines, and Polysperchon, with the selfe same dagger wherewith Dion before was slaine: the which was knownen by the facion, being short after the LACONIAN daggers, and also by the workmanship vpon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Aristomaché and Areta, they were taken out of prison: and Ietes SYRACUSAN, that somtimes had bene one of Dions frends, tooke them home to his owne house, and vsed them verie well and faithfully for a certaine time, but afterwards was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a shippe to be provided for them, and bare them in hande that he would sende them into PELOPONNESVS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away to kill them as they went, and to throw them ouer bord into the sea. Some say, that the two women, and the litle young boy, were cast aliuie into the sea. But this reward of the finfull act that he committed, returned againe vpon him selfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and besides, the SYRACUSANS did also kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulness he had shewed vnto Dion.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Brutus.

MARCUS BRUTUS came of that Iunius Brutus, for whome the auncient ROMANS made his statue of brasste to be set vp in the Capitoll, with the images of the kings, holding a naked sword in his hand: bicause he had valliantly put downe the TARQUINES from their kingdom of ROME. But that Iunius Brutus being of a softer stearne nature, not softned by reason, being like vnto sword blades of too hard a temper: was so subiect to his choller and malice he bare vnto the tyrannes, that for their sakes he caused his owne sonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrarie maner, whose life we presently wryte, hauing framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue and studie of Philosophie, and hauing employed his wit, which was gentle and constant, in attempting of great things: me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his verie enemies which wish him most hurt, bicause of his conspiracy against Iulius Caesar: if there were any noble attempt done in all this conspiracie, they refferre it whollie vnto Brutus, and all the cruell and violent actes vnto Cassius, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not so well geuen, and conditioned as he. His mother Servilia, it is thought came of the blood of Servilius Hala, who, when Spurius Melius went about to make him selfe king, and to bring it to passe had entised the common people to rebell: tooke a dagger and hid it close vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had somewhat to say vnto him, and pressed as neere him as he could: wherefore Melius stowping downe with his head, to heare what he would say, Brutus stabbed him in with his dagger, and slue him. Thus muche all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, some for the euil wil & malice they bare vnto Brutus, bicause of the death of Iulius Caesar, doe maintaine that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TARQUINES: for there were none left of his race, considering that his two sonnes were executed for conspiracie with the TARQUINES: and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane house, the which was raised to honor and office in the common wealth, but of late time. Polidonius the Philosopher wryteth the contrarie, that Iunius Brutus in deede slue two of his sonnes which were men grown, as the histories doe declare: howbeit that there was a third sonne, being A but a litle child at that time, from whom the house and family afterwards was deriued: and furthermore, that there were in his time certeine famous men of that familie, whose stature and countenance resembled much the image of Imitius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother vnto Serullia M. Brutus mother: whom Brutus studied most to follow of all the other ROMANES, because he was his Vncle, and afterwards he married his daughter. Now touching the GRÆCIAN Philosophers, there was no sect nor Philosopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but aboute all the rest, he loued Platoes sect best, & did not much geue him selfe to the new nor meane Academy as they call it, but altogether to the old Academy. Therefore he did euer greatly esteeme the Philosopher Antiochus, of the citie of ASCALON: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariston, who for learning and B knowledge was inferior to many other Philosophers, but for wisdom & curtesie, equal with the best and chiefeft. Touching Empylus, whom Marcus Brutus him selfe doth mention in his Epistells, and his friends also in many places: he was an Orator, and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Imitius Caesar, and titled it Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latine tongue, and was able to make long discourse in it, beside that he could also plead verie well in Latine. But for the GRÆKE tongue, they do note in some of his Epistells, that he counterfeited that briefe compendious maner of speech of the LACEDÆMONIANS. As when the warre was begonne, he wrote vnto the PARGAMENIANS in this sorte. I vnderstand you haue geuen Dolabella money: if you haue done it willingly, you confesse you haue offended me: if against your wills, shew it then by geuing me willingly. An other time againe vnto the SAMIANS: C Your counsels be long, your doings be slowe, consider the ende. And in an other Epistell he wrote vnto the PATARIANS: The XANTHIANS despising my good will, haue made their contrie a graue of dispaire: and the PATARIANS that put them selues into my protection, haue lost noior of their libertie. And therefore whilst you haue libertie, either choose the iudgement of the PATARIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. These were Brutus manner of letters which were honored for their briefenes. So Brutus being but a young stripling went into CYPRVS with his Vncle Cato, who was sent against Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who hauing flaine him selfe, Cato staying for certaine necessarie busines he had in the Ile of RHODES, had already sent * Caninius, one of his friends before, to keepe his treasure and goods. But Cato fearing he would be light fingered, wrote vnto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHYLIA, D (where he was but newlie recovered of a sickenesse) into CYPRVS, the which he did. The which iorney he was forie to take vpon him, both for respect of Caninius shame, whom Cato as he thought wrongfullie flandered: as also because he thought this office too meane and vnmeet for him, being a young man, and geuen to his booke. This notwithstanding, he bebaued him selfe so honestlie and carefullie, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goodes were sold and conuerted into readie money, he tooke the most parte of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwards when the Empire of ROME was deuicid into factions, and that Caesar and Pompey both were in armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboyle and vpror: it was thought then that Brutus would take parte with Caesar, because Pompey not long before had put his father vnto death. But Brutus preferring the respect of his contrie and common wealth, before priuate affection, and perswading himselfe E that Pompey had iuster cause to enter into armes then Caesar: he then tooke parte with Pompey, though oftentimes meeting him before, he thought scorne to speake to him, thinking it a great sinne and offence in him, to speake to the murderer of his father. But then submitting him selfe vnto Pompey, as vnto the head of the common wealth: he failed into SICILIA, Lieutenant vnder Sestius that was Gouvernor of that prouince. But when he saw that there was no way to rise, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Caesar & Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of him selfe vnseen for into MACEDON, to be partaker of the daunger. It is reported that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his coming when he saw him come to him: he rose out of his chaire, and went and embraced him before them all, and F fled him as honorably, as he could haue done the noblest man that tooke his parte. Brutus being in Pompeys campe, did nothing but studie all day long, except he were with Pompey, & not only the

A the dayes before, but the selfe same day also before the great battell was fought in the fieldes of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouerthrowen. It was in the middelt of sommer, and the sunne was verie hotte, besides that the campe was lodged neere vnto marishes, and they that carried his tent, taried long before they came: whereuppon, being verie wearie with trauell, scant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others slept, or thought what would happen the morrowe after: he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long till night, writing a breuiarie of Polybius. It is reported that Caesar did not forgette him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they shoulde beware they killed not Brutus in fight, and if he yeelded willinglie vnto them, that then they shoulde bring him vnto him: but if he resisted, and would not be taken, then that they shoulde lette him goe, B and doe him no hurte. Some saye he did this for Serullias sake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had bene acquainted with Serullia, who was extreame in loue with him. And bicaule Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hottest, he perswaded him selfe that he began him. For prooffe hereof the reporte goeth, that when the waightiest matters were in hande in the Senate, about the conspiracie of Catiline, which was likelie to haue vndone the citie of ROME, Caesar and Cato fate neere together, and were both of contrarie mindes to eache other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Caesar a letter. Caesar tooke it, and red it softlie to him selfe: but Cato cried out vpon Caesar, and sayd he did not well to receiue aduertisements from enemies. Whereuppon the whole Senate beganne to murmure at it. Then Caesar gaue Cato the letter as it was sent him, who red C it, and founde that it was a loue letter sent from his sister Serullia: thereuppon he cast it againe to Caesar, and sayde vnto him, holde, drunken soppe. When he had done so, he went on with his tale, and maintayned his opinion as he did before: so commonlie was the loue of Serullia knownen which the bare vnto Caesar. So, after Pompeys ouerthrowe at the battell of PHARSALIA, and that he fledde to the sea: when Caesar came to beseege his campe, Brutus went out of the campe gates vnseene of any man, and leapt into a marishe full of water and reedes. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the citie of LARIS- SAR: from whence he wrote vnto Caesar, who was verie glad that he had scaped, & sent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onelie pardon him, but also kept him alwayes about him, and did as muche honor and esteeme him, any man he had in D his companie. Nowe no man coule tell whether Pompey was fledde, and all were maruelous desirous to knowe it: wherefore Caesar walking a good waye alone with Brutus, he did aske him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Caesar perceiuing by his talke that Brutus gesfed certainlie whether Pompey shoulde be fledde: he left all other wayes, and tooke his iorney directlie towards ÆGYPT. Pompey, as Brutus had coniectured, was in deede fledde into ÆGYPT, but there he was villanoully slayne. Furthermore, Brutus obteyned pardon of Caesar for Caesars: and defending also the king * of LYBIAES cause, he was ouerlaid with a worlde of accusacions against him, howbeit intreating for him, he saued him the best parte of his realme and kingdom. They say also that Caesar sayd, when he hearde Brutus pleade: I knowe not, sayd he, what this young man woulde, but what he woulde, he willett it vhe- E mentlie. For as Brutus granetie and constant minde would not graunt all men their requests that sued vnto him, but being moued with reason and discretion, did alwayes encline to that which was good and honest: euen so when it was moued to followe any matter, he vsed a kinde of forcible and vehement perswasion that calmed not, till he had obteyned his desire. For by flattering of him, a man coule neuer obteyne any thing at his handes, nor make him to doe that which was vnjust. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and estimation, to yeelde vnto the requestes and intreaties of a shamelesse and importunate flatterer, requesting thinges vnmeet: the which notwithstanding, some men doe for shame, because they dare deny nothing. And therefore he was wont to say, that he thought them euill brought vp in their youth, that could deny nothing. Nowe when Caesar tooke sea to goe F into AFRICKE, against Cato and Scipio, he left Brutus Gouvernor of GAYLE in ITALIE, on this side of the Alpes, which was a great good happe for that prouince. For where others were spoyled and polled by the insolencie and couetousnesse of the Gouvernours, as if it had

* This king was Imitius howbeit it is true also, that Brutus made intercession for Decimus king of Galatia: who was depreied not withstanding of the most parte of his contrie, by Caesar and Caesar and therefore this place were best to be vnderstanded, by Decimus. Caesar made Brutus Gouvernor of Gayle on this side the mountains.

bene a contrie conquered: Brutus was a comfote and rest vnto their former troubles and miseries they susteyned. But he referred it whollie vnto Caesars grace and goodnesse. For, when Caesar returned out of Africke, and progressed vp and downe Italye: the things that pleased him best to see, were the cities vnder Brutus charge and government, and Brutus him selfe: who honored Caesar in person, and whose companie also Caesar greatly esteemed. Now there were diuers sortes of Prætorshippes at Rome, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Cassius would make sute for the chieftest Prætorshippe, which they called the Prætorshippe of the citie: because he that had that office, was as a Iudge to minister iustice vnto the citizens. Therefore they stroue one against the other, though some say that there was some little grudge betweene them for other matters before, and that this contention did sette them further out, though they were allyed together. For Cassius had married Iunia, Brutus sister. Others say, that this contention betwixt them came by Caesar himselfe, who secretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauour. So their sute for the Prætorshippe was so followed and laboured of either partie, that one of them put an other in sute of lawe. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble employes in armes, which Cassius had done against the Parthians. So Caesar after he had heard both their obiections, he told his frendes with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the iustest, sayd he, but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorshippe, and Cassius the second: who thanked not Caesar so much for the Prætorshippe he had, as he was angrie with him for that he had lost. But Brutus in many other things tasted of the benefite of Caesars fauour in anything he requested. For if he had listed, he might haue bene one of Caesars chieftest frendes, and of greatest authoritie and credit about him. Howebeit Cassius frendes did disswade him from it (for Cassius and he were not yet reconciled together sithence their first contention and strife for the Prætorshipp) and prayed him to beware of Caesars sweete intisements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauours: the which they sayd Caesar gaue him, not to honor his vertue, but to weaken his constant minde, framing it to the bent of his bowe. Now Caesar on the other side did not trust him ouermuch, nor was not without tales brought vnto him against him: howbeit he feared his great minde, authority, & frends. Yet on the other side also, he trusted his good nature, & fayer condicions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him: he answered, that these far long heard men made him not affrayed, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that, by Brutus and Cassius. At an other time also when one accused Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: VVhat, sayd he againe, clapping his hand on his brest, thinke ye that Brutus will not tarie till this bodie dye? Meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to haue suche power as he had. And surelie, in my opinion, I am perswaded that Brutus might in dede haue come to haue bene the chieftest man of Rome, if he could haue contented him selfe for a time to haue bene next vnto Caesar, & to haue suffred his glorie and authoritie, which he had gotten by his great victories, to consume with time. But Cassius being a chollericke man, and hating Caesar priuatie, more then he did the tyrannicall openlie: he incensed Brutus against him. It is also reported, that Brutus coulde euill away with the tyrannicall, and that Cassius hated the tyrannicall: making many complainies for the iniuries he had done him, and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lyons from him. Cassius had prouided them for his sportes, when he should be Ædilis, and they were found in the citie of Megara, when it was wonne by Calepus, and Caesar kept them. The rumor went, that these Lyons did marcelous great hurt to the Magarians. For when the citie was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied vp, and turned them loose, thinking they would haue done great mischief to the enemies, and haue kept them from setting vpon them: but the Lyons contrarie to expectation, turned vpon them selues that fled vnarmed, & did so cruelly tare some in peces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause, as some do report, that made Cassius conspire against Caesar. But this holdeth no water. For Cassius euen fro his cradell could not abide any manner of tyrans, as it appeared when he was but a boy, & went vnto the same schoole that Fausus, the sonne of Sylla did. And Fausus bragging amongst other boyes, highly boasted of his fathers kingdom: Cassius rose vp on his seete, and gaue him two good whirrs on the eare. Fausus gouernors would haue put this matter in sute against Cassius: But

A But Pompey would not suffer them, but caused the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them howe the matter came to passe. Then Cassius, as it is wrytten of him, sayd vnto the other: goe to Fausus, speake againe and thou darrest, before this noble man here, the same wordes that made me angrie with thee, that my filtes may walke once againe about thine eares. Suche was Cassius hott stirring nature. But for Brutus, his frendes and contrie did openlie call and procure him to doe that he did. For, vnder the image of his auncester Iunius Brutus, that draue the kinges out of Rome, they wrote: O, that it pleased the goddes thou wert nowe aliuie, Brutus: and againe, that thou wert here amonge vs nowe. His tribunall (or chaire) where he gaue audience during the time he was Prætor, was full of suche billes: Brutus, thou art a sleeper, and art not Brutus in dede. And of all this, Caesars flatterers were the cause: who beside many other exceeding and vnspeakeable honors they dayly deuised for him, in the night time they did put Diademes vpon the heades of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him kinge, in steade of Dictator. Howebeit it turned to the contrarie, as we haue wrytten more at large in Iulius Caesars life. Nowe when Cassius felt his frendes, and did stirre them vp against Caesar: they all agreed and promised to take parte with him, so Brutus were the chiefe of their conspircie. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not so muche require men of manhoode, and courage to drawe their swordes: as it stoode them vpon to haue a man of suche estimation as Brutus, to make euerie man boldlie thinke, that by his onelie presence the fact were holie, and iust. If he tooke not this course, then that they shoulde goe to it with fainter hartes, and when they had done it, they shoulde be more fearefull: because euerie man would thinke that Brutus would not haue refused to haue made one with them, if the cause had bene good and honest. Therefore Cassius considering this matter with him selfe, did first of all speake to Brutus, since they grewe strange together for the sute they had for the Prætorshippe. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had imbraced one another: Cassius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house, the first day of the moneth of Marche, because he heard say that Caesars frendes shoulde moue the counsell that day, that Caesar shoulde be called king by the Senate. Brutus answered him, he would not be there. But if we be sent for sayd Cassius: howe then? For my selfe then sayd Brutus, I meane D not to holde my peace, but to withstande it, and rather dye then lose my libertie. Cassius being bolde, and taking holde of this worde: why, & he, what Romane is he aliuie that will suffer thee to dye for the libertie? VVhat, knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? I thinkest thou that they be cobblers, tapsters, or suche like base mechanically people, that wryte these billes and scrowles which are founde dayly in thy Prætors chaire, and not the noblest men and best citizens that doe it? No, be thou well assured, that of other Prætors they looke for giftes, common distribucions amongst the people, and for common playes, and to see sencers fight at the sharpe, to shew the people pastime: but at thy handes, they specially require (as a due det vnto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to suffer any extremity for thy sake. So that thou wilt shew thy selfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. E Thereupon he kissed Brutus, and imbraced him: and so each taking leaue of other, they went both to speake with their frendes about it. Nowe amongst Pompeys frendes, there was one called Caius Ligarius, who had bene accused vnto Caesar for taking parte with Pompey, and Caesar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Caesar so muche for his discharge, as he was offended with him for that he was brought in daunger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his heart he was alway his mortal enemy, and was besides verie familiar with Brutus, who went to see him beinge sicke in his bedde, and sayd vnto him: O Ligarius, in what a time art thou sicke? Ligarius risinge vpe in his bedde, and taking him by the right hande, sayd vnto him: Brutus, sayd he, if thou hast any great enterprise in hande worthe of thy selfe, I am whole. After that time they beganne to feele all their acquaintance whome they trusted, and layed their heades together consultinge vpon it, and did not onelie picke out their frendes, but all those also whome they thought stowt enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not affrayed to loose their liues,

For this cause they durst not acquaint Cicero with their conspiracie, although he was a man A whome they loued dearelie, and trusted best: for they were affrayed that he being a coward by nature, and age also hauing increased his feare, he woulde quite turne and alter all their purpose, and quenche the heate of their enterprife, the which speciallie required hotte and earnest execution, seeking by perswasion to bring all thinges to suche safetie, as there should be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his frendes alone, as Statilius Epicurius, and Faonius, that made profession to followe Marcus Cato. Bicaufe that hauing cast out wordes a sarre of, disputing together in Philosophie to feele their mindes: Faonius answered, that ciuill warre was worse then tyrannicall gouernment vsurped against the lawe. And Statilius tolde him also, that it were an vnwise parte of him, to put his life in danger, for a sight of ignoraunt fooles and asses. Labeo was present at this talke, and maintayned the contrarie against them both. But Brutus helde his peace, as though it had bene a doubtfull matter, and a harde thing to haue decided. But afterwards, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent: who verie readilie offered him selfe to make one. And they thought good also to bring in an other Brutus to ioyne with him, surnamed Albinus: who was no man of his handes him selfe, but bicaufe he was able to bring good force of a great number of slaues, and sencers at the sharpe, whome he kept to shewe the people pastime with their fighting, besides also that Caesar had some trust in him. Cassius and Labeo tolde Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no answer. But when he had spoken with Brutus him selfe alone, and that Brutus had tolde him he was the chiefe ringleader of all this conspiracie: then he willinglie promised him the best aide he coulde. Furthermore, the onlie name and great calling of Brutus, did bring on the most of them to geue consent to this conspiracie. C Who hauing neuer taken othes together, nor taken or geuen any caution or assurance, nor binding them selues one to an other by any religious othes: they all kept the matter so secret to them selues, and coulde so cunninglie handle it, that notwithstanding the goddes did reueale it by manifest signes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of sacrifices: yet all this woulde not be beleued. Nowe Brutus, who knewe verie well that for his sake all the noblest, valliantest, and most courageous men of Rome did venter their liues, waying with him selfe the greatesse of the danger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and facion his countenance and lookes, that no man coulde discerne he had any thing to trouble his minde. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he was cleane chaunged. For, either care did wake him against his will when he woulde haue slept, or else oftentimes of him selfe he fell into suche deepe thoughtes of this enterprife, casting in his minde all the dangers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, founde that there was some maruelous great matter that troubled his minde, not beinge wont to be in that taking, and that he coulde not well determine with him selfe. His wife Porcia (as we haue tolde you before) was the daughter of Cato, whome Brutus married being his cousin, not a maiden, but a youngewidow after the death of her first husbando Bibulus, by whome the had also a yongue sonne called Bibulus, who afterwards wrote a booke of the actes and ieaftes of Brutus, extant at this present day. This young Ladie being excellentlie well scene in Philosophie, louing her husbando well, and being of a noble courage, as she E was also wise: bicaufe she woulde not aske her husbando what he ayled before she had made some prooffe by her selfe, she tooke a litle rasor suche as barbers occupie to pare mens nayles, and causinge all her maydes and women to goe out of her chamber, gaue her selfe a greate gashe withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a goare bloodie, and incontinentlie after, a vehement feuer tooke her, by reason of the payne of her wounde. Then perceiuing her husbando was maruelouslie out of quiet, and that he coulde take no rest: euen in her greatest payne of all, she spake in this sorte vnto him. I being, O Brutus, (sayed she) the daughter of Cato, was married vnto thee, not to be thy beddefellowe and companion in bedde and at borde onelie, like a harlot: but to be partaker also with thee, of thy good and euill fortune. Nowe for thy selfe, I can finde no cause of faulte in thee touching our matche: but for my parte, howe may I shewe my dutie towards thee, and howe muche I woulde doe for thy sake, if I can not constantlie beare a secret mischaunce

A or grieue with thee, which requireth secrecy and fidelity? I confesse, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a secret safely: but yet, Brutus, good education, and the companie of vertuous men, haue some power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my selfe, I haue this benefit moreouer: that I am the daughter of Cato, & wife of Brutus. This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before: vntill that now I haue found by experience, that no paine nor grieue whatsoeuer can ouercome me. With those wordes she shewed him her wounde on her thigh, and tolde him what she had done to proue her selfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what she sayd vnto him, and lifting vp his handes to heauen, he besought the goddes to geue him the grace he might bring his enterprife to so good passe, that he might be founde a husband, worthie of so noble a wife as Porcia: so he then did comfort her the best B he coulde. Now a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Caesar woulde not faile to come: the conspirators determined then to put their enterprife in execution, bicaufe they might meete safelie at that time without suspition, and the rather, for that all the noblest and chieftest men of the citie woulde be there. Who when they should see suche a great matter executed, woulde euerie man then fet to their handes, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the counsell shoulde be kept, was chosen of purpose by diuine prouidence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of seates for men to sit in, where also was set vp the image of Pompey, which the citie had made and consecrated in honor of him: when he did beawtifie that parte of the citie with the Theater he built, with diuers porches about it. In this place was the assembly of the Senate appointed to be, iust on the fifteenth day of the moneth of March, which the Romanes call, Idus Martias: so that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Caesar thither to be slaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side vnder his long gowne, that no bodie sawe nor knewe, but his wife onelie. The other conspirators were all assembled at Cassius house, to bring his sonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis: and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porche, looking that Caesar woulde straight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull assured constancie of these conspirators, in so dangerous and waigtie an enterprife as they had vnderaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reason of their office, whose dutie it is to minister iustice to euerie bodie: they did not onelie with great quietnesse and curtesie heare them that spake vnto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentie eare, as if they had had no other matter in their heades: but moreouer, they gaue iust sentence, and carefullie dispatched the causes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine summe of money, refused to pay it, and cried out that he did appeale vnto Caesar. Then Brutus casting his eyes vpon the conspirators, sayd, Caesar shall not lette me to see the lawe executed. Notwithstanding this, by chaunce there fell out many misfortunes vnto them, which was enough to haue marred the enterprife. The first and chieftest was, Caesars long tarrying, who came verie late to the Senate: for bicaufe the signes of the sacrifices appeared E vnluckie, his wife Calpurnia kept him at home, and the Soothlayers bad him beware he went not abroad. The seconde cause was, when one came vnto Caesa being a conspirator, and taking him by the hande, sayd vnto him: O Caesa, thou keptest it close from me, but Brutus hath tolde me all. Caesa being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and sayd: why, howe nowe, howe commeth it to passe thou art thus riche, that thou doest lue to be Ædilis? Thus Caesa being deceiued by the others doubtfull wordes, he tolde them it was a thowland to one, he blabbed not out all the conspiracie. An other Senator called Popilius Læna, after he had saluted Brutus and Cassius more frendlie then he was wont to doe: he rounded softlie in their eares, and told them, I pray the goddes you may goe through with that you haue taken in hande, but withall, dispatche I reade you, for your enterprife is bewrayed. When he had F sayd, he presentlie departed from them, and left them both affrayed that their conspiracie woulde out. Nowe in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men post hast vnto him, and tolde him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being verie carefull and pensive for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with so great and inward griefe of minde: the A could hardlie keepe within, but was fighred with euerie litle noyfe and crie the hearde, as those that are taken and posselt with the furie of the Bacchantes, asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and still sent messenger after messenger, to knowe what newes. At length, Casars coming being prolonged as you haue heard, Fortiaes weak-had no leasure to goe to her chamber, but was taken in the middelt of her house, where her speache and fences failed her. Howbeit the soone came to her selfe againe, and so was layed in her bedde, and tended by her women. When Brutus heard these newes, it grieved him, as it is to be presupposed: yet he left not of the care of his contrie and common wealth, neither went home to his house for any newes he heard. Nowe, it was reported that Cesar was comming in his litter: for he determined not to stay in the Senate all that day (because he was affrayed of the vnluckie signes of the sacrifices) but to adorne matters of importance vnto the next session and counsell holden, faining him selfe not to be well at ease. When Cesar came out of his litter: Popilius Lena, that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the goddes they might bring this enterprise to passe: went vnto Cesar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cesar gaue good care vnto him. Wherefore the conspirators (if so they should be called) not hearing what he sayd to Cesar, but coniecturing by that he had tolde them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the verie discouerie of their conspiracie: they were affrayed euerie man of them, and one looking in an others face, it was easie to see that they all were of a minde, that it was no tarying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they should kill them selues with their owne hands. And when Cassius and certaine other clapped their hands on their swordes vnder their gownes to draw them: Brutus marking the countenance and gesture of Lena, and considering that he did vie him selfe rather like an humble and earnest suer, then like an accuser: he sayd nothing to his companion (because there were many amongst them that were not of the conspiracie) but with a pleasant countenance encouraged Cassius. And immediatly after, Lena went from Cesar, and kissed his hande: which shewed plainlie that it was for some matter concerning him selfe, that he had held him so long in talke. Nowe all the Senators being entred first into this place or chapter house where the counsell should be kept: all the other conspirators straight stode about Casars chaire, as if they had had some thing to haue sayd vnto him. And some say, that Cassius calling his eyes vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aliuie. * Trebonius on thother side, drew Antonius asofide, as he came into the house where the Senate sate, and helde him with a long talke without. When Cesar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honor him at his comming in. So when he was set, the conspirators stoked about him, & amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble sute for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercessors for him, and tooke him by the handes, and kissed his head and brest. Cesar at the first, simplie refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwards, perceiuing they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Casars gowne ouer his shoulders, and Casca that stode behinde him, drew his dagger first, and strake Cesar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cesar feeling him selfe hurt, tooke him straight by the hande he held his dagger in, and cried out in Latin: O traitor, Casca, what dost thou? Casca on thother side cried in Grake, and called his brother to helpe him. So diuers running on a heape together to flie vpon Cesar, he looking about him to haue fledde, sawe Brutus with a sword drawn in his hande readie to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hande goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered euerie man to strike at him that would. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon an other because euerie man was desirous to haue a cut at him, so many swordes and daggers lighting vpon one bodie, one of them hurte an other, and amongst them Brutus caught a blowe on his hande, because he would make one in murdering of him, and all the rest also were euery man of them bloudied. Cesar being slaine in this manner, Brutus standing in the middelt of the house, would haue spoken, and stayed the other Senators that were not of the conspiracie, to haue tolde

A them the reason why they had done this acte. But they as men both affrayd and amazed, fled one vpon anothers necke in haste to get out at the dore, and no man followed them. For it was set downe, and agreed betwene them, that they should kill no man but Cesar onely, and should intreate all the rest to looke to defend their libertie. All the conspirators, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauored tyranny: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with souldiers, hauing bene conuerfant of long time amongst them: and specially, hauing a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authoritie at that time, being Consul with Cesar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he sayd it was not honest: secondly, because he told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not mistrust, but that Antonius being a noble minded and coragious man (when he should knowe that Cesar was dead) would willingly helpe his contry to recouer her libertie, hauing them an example vnto him, to follow their corage and vertue. So Brutus by this meanes faued Antonius life, who at that present time disguised him selfe, and staid away. But Brutus & his consorts, hauing their swordes bloudy in their handes, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMANES as they went, to take their libertie againe. Now, at the first time when the murder was newly done, there were sodaine outcries of people that ranne vp & downe the cite, the which in deede did the more increase the feare and tumult. But when they saw they slue no man, nether did spoyle or make hauck of any thing: then certaine of the Senators, & many of the people inbolnding them selues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being assembled together one after another: Brutus made an oration vnto them to winne the fauor of the people, and to iustifie that they had done. All those that were by, sayd they had done well, and cryed vnto them that they should boldly come downe from the Capitoll. Whereupon, Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The rest followed in trowpe, but Brutus went formost, very honorably compassed in round about with the noblest men of the cite, which brought him from the Capitoll, thorough the market place, to the pulpit for orations. When the people saw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehells of all sortes, and had a good will to make some sturre: yet being ashamed to doe it for the reuerence they bare vnto Brutus, they kept silence, to heare what he would say. When Brutus began to speake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murder. For when another called Cinna would haue spoken, and began to accuse Cesar: they fell into a great vprore among them, and maruelously reuiled him. In somuch that the conspirators returned againe into the Capitoll. There Brutus being affrayd to be beseeged, sent back againe the noble men that came thither with him, thinking into reason, that they which were no partakers of the murder, should be partakers of the danger. Then the next morning the Senate being assembled, and holden within the temple of the goddesse Tellus, to wete the earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, hauing made a motion to the Senate in that assembly, that they should take an order to pardon and forget all that was past, and to stablishe friendship and peace againe: it was decreed, that they should not onely be pardoned, but also that the Consuls should referre it to the Senate what honors E should be appointed vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Consul, to put them in hart that were in the Capitoll, sent them his sonne for a pledge.
Vpon this assurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where eu-ery man saluted and embraced eche other, among the which, Antonius him selfe did bid Cassius to supper to him: and Lepidus also bad Brutus, and so one bad another, as they had friendship and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to counsell, did first of all commend Antonius, for that he had wisely stayed and quenched the beginning of a ciuill warre: then they also gaue Brutus and his consorts great prayes, and lastly they appointed them severall governments of prouinces. For vnto Brutus, they appointed CRE-TA: AFRICK, vnto Cassius: ASIA, vnto Trebonius: BITHYNIA, vnto Cimber: and vnto the o-F ther Decius Brutus Albinus, GAULE on this side the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talke of Casars will and testamēt, and of his funerals and tombe. Then Antonius thinking good his testamēt should be red openly, and also that his body should be honorably buried, and not in hugger mugger, least the people might thereby take occasion to be worse offended if they did otherwise: Cassius slowly spake against it. But Brutus went with the motion, & agreed vnto it: wherein it seemeth he committed a second fault. For the first fault he did was, when he would not consent to his fellow conspirators, that Antonius should be slayne: And therefore he was iustly accused, that thereby he had faued and strengthened a stronge & grieuous enemy of their conspiracy. The second fault was, when he agreed that Casars funeralls should be as Antonius would haue them: the which in deede marred all. For first of all, when Casars testament was openly red amongst them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery Citizen of ROME, 75. Drachmas a man, and that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this side of the riuer of Tyber, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruelous sory for him. B Afterwards when Casars body was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall oration in praise of the dead, according to the auncient custom of ROME, and perceiuing that his wordes moued the common people to compassion: he framed his eloquence to make their hartes yerne the more, and taking Casars gowne all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the sight of them all, shewing that a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. There-withall the people fell presently into such a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongst the common people. For some of them cryed out, kill the murderers: others plucked vp formes, tables, and stalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funeralls of Clodius, and hauing layed them all on a heape together, they set them on fire, and thereupon did put the bodye of Cesar, and burnt it in the midst of the most holy places. C And furthermore, when the fire was thoroughly kindled, some here, some there, tooke burning fire brands, and ranne with them to the murderers houses that had killed him, to set them a fire. Howbeit the conspirators foreseeing the danger before, had wisely provided for their selues, and fled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had bene no partaker of the conspiracy, but was alway one of Casars chiefe friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cesar had him to supper with him, and that he refusing to goe, Cesar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, so that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruelously affrayd, he was driuen to follow him in spite of his hart. This dreame put him all night into a feuer, and yet notwithstanding, the next morning when he heard that they caried Casars body to buriall, being ashamed not to accompany his funeralls: D he went out of his house, and thrust him self into the preale of the common people that were in a great vpror. And because some one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had bene that Cinna, who in an oration he made had spoken very euill of Cesar, they falling vpon him in their rage, slue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affrayd, then any other thing, next vnto the chaunge of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of ROME, and kept at the first in the citie of ANTIVM, hoping to returne againe to ROME, when the furie of the people were a litle asswaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, considering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconstant multitude, easie to be caried, and that the Senate stood for them: who notwithstanding made no enquiry of them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but caused them to be sought for and apprehended, that went with fire brands to set fire of the conspirators houses. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and infoleny, who ruled all things in manner with absolute power: they desired that Brutus might returne againe, and it was also looked for, that Brutus would come him selfe in person to playe the playes which were due to the people, by reason of his office of Prætorship. But Brutus vnderstanding that many of Casars souldiers which serued vnder him in the warres, and that also had lands and houses giuen them in the cities where they lay, did lye in wayte for him to kill him, and that they dayly by small companies came by one and by one into ROME: he durst no more returne thither, but yet the people had the pleasure and pastyme in his absence, to see the games and sportes he made them, which were sumptuouslie set forth and furnished with all thinges necessarie, F sparing for no cost. For he had bought a great number of straunge beastes, of the which he would not geue one of them to any frende he had, but that they should all be employed in his

Brutus playes and sportes at Rome in his absence.

A his games: and went him selfe as farre as BYZANTIUM, to speake to some players of comedies and Mofitions that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Cannius an excellent player, that whatsoeuer they did, they should intreate him to play in these playes: For, sayd he, it is no reason to compell any GREEKIAN, vnles he will come of his owne good will. Moreover, he wrote also vnto Cicero, and earnestly prayed him in any case to be at these playes. Now the state of ROME standing in these termes, there fell out an other chaunge and alteration, when the young man Octavius Cesar came to ROME. He was the sonne of Iulius Cesar Nece, whome he had adopted for his sonne, and made his heire, by his last will and testament. But when Iulius Cesar his adopted father was slayne, he was in the citie of APOLLONIA, where he studied tarying for him, because he was determined to makewarre with the PARTHIANS: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned againe to ROME, where to begin to curry fauor with the common people, he first of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, & made distribution amongst them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius sorely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers souldiers together, that had serued in the warres with him. And Cicero him selfe, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauor his proceedings. But Brutus maruelously reprobued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he seemed by his doings not to be sory to haue a Maister, but only to be affrayd to haue one that should hate him: and that all his doings in the common wealth did witness, that he chose to be subiect to a milde and curteous bondage, sith by his words and writings he did commend this young man Octavius Cesar, to be a good and gentle Lorde. For our predecessours sayde he, would neuer abyde to be subiect to any Maisters, how gentle or mild soeuer they were: and for his owne part that he had neuer resolutely determined with him selfe to make warre, or peace, but otherwise, that he was certainly minded neuer to be slaued nor subiect. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero could be affrayd of the danger of ciuill warres, and would not be affrayd of a shameful peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the vsurped tyranny, in recompence he went about to stablish the younge Octavius Cesar tyranne. These were the contents of Brutus first letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now, the citie of ROME being deuided in two factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning vnto Octavius Cesar, and the souldiers making port pale of their seruice to him that would giue most: Brutus seeing the state of ROME would be vtterly ouerthrowen, he determined to goe out of ITALY, and went a foote through the contry of LVKE, vnto the citie of ELEA, standing by the sea. There Porcia being ready to depart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to ROME, did what she could to dissemble the griefe and sorow she felt at her hart: But a certaine paynted table bewrayed her in the ende, although vntill that time she alwayes shewed a constant and patient mind. The deuisse of the table was taken out of the Greeke stories, howe Andromache accompanied her husband Hector, when he went out of the citie of TROY to goe to the warres, and how Hector deliuered her his litle sonne, and how her eyes were neuer of him. Porcia seeing this picture, and likening her selfe to be in the same case, (she fell a weeping: and comming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acilius one of Brutus friendes perceiuing that, rehearsed the verses Andromache speaketh to this purpose in Homer:

E Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother, And husband eke, and in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus smyling, answered againe: but yet (sayd he) I can not for my part, say vnto Porcia, as Hector answered Andromache in the same place of the Poet:

Tush, meddle thou with veyeing deuoly ouer Thy mayds their task, and pricking on a clorut.

For in deede, the weake constitution of her body, doth not suffer her to performe in shew, the valliant acts that we are able to doe: but for corage and constant minde, she shewed her selfe as stowt in the defence of her contry, as any of vs. Bibulus, the sonne of Porcia, reporteth F this story thus. Now Brutus imbarcking at ELEA in LVKE, he sayled directly towards ATHENS. When he arriued there, the people of ATHENS receiued him with common ioyes of reioycing, and honorable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whome he went daily to heare the lectures of Theonemius ACADEMICK Philosopher, and of Cratippus the P^{er}ipateticke, and so would talke with them in Philosophie, that it seemed he left all other matters, and gaue him selfe onely vnto studie: howbeit secretly notwithstanding, he made preparation for warre. For he sent Herophilus into MACEDON, to winne the Capitaines and souldiers that were vpon those marches, & he did also entertheye all the younge gentlemen of the ROMANES, whome he founde in ATHENS studying Philosophie: amongst them he found *Cicero*s sonne, whome he highly prayded and commended, saying, that whether he waked or slept, he found him of a noble mind and disposition, he did in nature so much hate tyrannes. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertised that there came out of ASIA a certaine flecte of ROMANESHIPS that had good store of money in them, and that the Capitaine of those shippes (who was an honest man, and his familiar friende) came towards ATHENS: he went to meete him as farre as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and hauing spoken with him there, he handled him so, that he was contented to leaue his shippes in his hands. Whereuppon he made him a notable banquet at his house, because it was on his birth day. When the feast day came, & that they began to drinke lustely one to another: the ghefts dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the libertie of the ROMANES. Brutus therefore to encourage them further, called for a bigger cuppe, & holding it in his hand, before he dranke spake thus alowd:

My destiny and Phœbus are agreede, To bring me to my finall end with speede.

And for prooofe hereof, it is reported, that the same day he fought his last battell by the citie of PHILIPPS, as he came out of his tent, he gaue his men for the word and signall of battell, Phœbus: so that it was thought euer since, that this his Iodaine crying out at the feast, was a prognostication of his misfortune that should happen. After this, Antistius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALY, so Myriades. Furthermore, all *Pompey*s souldiers that stragled vp and downe THESALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna also, fūe hundred horsemen, which he caried into ASIA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by sea vnto the city of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armor and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had bene made and forged there by *Julius Cæsar*s commaundement, for the warres against the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortensius gouernor of MACEDON, did resigne the gouernment thereof vnto him. Besides, all the Princes, kings and noble men thereabouts, came and ioyned with him, when it was told him that Caius, (Antonius brother) coming out of ITALY, had passed the sea, & came with great speede towards the citie of DYRRACHIUM, and APOLLONIA, to get the souldiers into his hands, which Gabinus had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went presently with a fewe of his men in the middle of winter when it snowed hard, and tooke his way thorough hard and fowle countries, and made such speede in deede, that he was there long before Antonius sumpters, that caried the vitells. So that when he came neare vnto DYRRACHIUM, a disease tooke him which the Phisitions call Valeria, to say, a cormorant and vnstatable appetite to eate: by reason of the cold and paynes he had taken. This sickness chaunceth often, both to men & beasts, that traualle when it hath snowen: Either because the naturall heate being retyred into the inward parts of the body, by the coldnes of the ayer hardening the skinn, doth straight digest and consume the meate: or els because a sharpe furell wind comming by reason of the snow when it is molten, doth pearce into the body, and drieth out the naturall heate which was cast outward. For it seemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall comming out of the skinn of the body: causeth the sweates that follow the disease. But hereof we haue spoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faynt, and hauing nothing in his campe to eate: his souldiers were compelled to goe to their enemies, & comming to the gates of the citie, they prayed the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what case Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requittal whereof, afterwards when he wanne the citie, he did not onely intreate and vse the Citizens thereof, courteously, but all the inhabitants of the citie also for their sakes. Now, when Caius Antonius was arrived in the citie of APOLLONIA, he sent vnto the souldiers thereabouts to come vnto vnto him. But when he vnderstoode that they went all to Brutus, and furthermore, that the Citizens of APOLLONIA did fauor him much: he then forooke that citie, and went vnto the citie of BYTHROTUS, but yet he lost three of his ensignes by the way, that were slayne euery man of them. Then he sought by force to winne certaine places of strength about BYLLIS, & to driue Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obayne his purpose, he fought a battell with Cicero, the sonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whome he was ouercome. For Brutus made the yonger Cicero a Capitaine, and did many notable exploit by his seruice. Shortly after, hauing stolen vpon Caius Antonius in certain maner, he came from the place from whence he fled: he would not set on him with furie, but onely rood round about him, commanding his souldiers to spare him & his men, as reckoning them all his owne without stroke striking: and so in deede it hapned. For they yielded them selues, and their Capitaine Antonius, vnto Brutus: so that Brutus had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office, and neuer tooke from him the markes and signes of his Consulship, although many of his friends, & Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he sawe Antonius secretly practised with his Capitaines to make some alteration: then he sent him into a shippe, and made him to be kept there. When the souldiers whome C. Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the citie of APOLLONIA, and sent from thence vnto Brutus to come vnto them: he made them aunswere, that it was not the manner of ROMANE Capitaines to come to the souldiers, but the souldiers to come to the Capitaine, and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereuppon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goe into ASIA, newes came vnto him of the great change at Rome. For Octavius Cæsar was in armes, by commaundement and authoritie from the Senate, against Marcus Antonius. But after that he had driuen Antonius out of ITALY, the Senate then began to be affrayd of him: because he sued to be Consul, which was contrary to the law, and kept a great army about him, when the Empire of Rome had no neede of them. On the other side, Octavius Cæsar perceiuing the Senate stayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of ITALY, and that they appoynted him the gouernment of certaine prouinces: then he began to be affrayd for his part, and sent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendship. Then comming on with his army neare to Rome, he made him selfe to be chosen Consul, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a stripling or springall of twenty yeare old, as him selfe reporteth in his owne commentaries. So when he was Consul, he presently appoynted Iudges to accuse Brutus and his companions, for killing of the noblest person in Rome, and chiefeest Magistrate, without law or iudgement: and made L. Cornificius accuse Brutus, and M. Agrippa Cæsius. So, the parties accused were condemned, because the Iudges were compelled to giue such sentence. The voyce went, that when the Herauld (according to the custom after sentence giuen) went vp to the chaier or pulpit for orations, & proclaymed Brutus with a loud voyce, summoning him to appeare in person before the Iudges: the people that stood by sighed openly, and the noble men that were present honged downe their heads, & durst not speake a word. Among them, the teares fell from Publius Silius eyes: who shortly after, was one of the proscriptors or outlawes appoynted to be slayne. After that, these three E. Octavius Cæsar, Antonius, and Lepidus, made an agreement betweene them selues, and by those articles deuicid the prouinces belonging to the Empire of Rome amonge them selues, and did set vp billes of proscriptiō and outlary, condemning two hundred of the noblest men of Rome to suffer death, and among that number, Cicero was one. Newes being brought thereof into MACEDON, Brutus being then inforced to it, wrote vnto Hortensius, that he should put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of Cicero, and of the other Brutus, of the which the one was his friend, and the other his kinsman. For this cause therefore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortensius at the battell of PHILIPPS, he made him to be slayne vpon his brothers tombe. But then Brutus sayd, that he was more ashamed of the cause for the which Cicero was slayne, then he was otherwise sory for his death: and that he could not but greatly reprove his friends he had at Rome, who were slaynes more through their owne fault, then through their valliantnes or manhood which vsurped the tyranny: considering that they were so cowardly and faynt harted, as to suffer the sight of those things before their eyes, the report whereof should onely haue grieved them to the hart. Nowe when Brutus had passed ouer his army (that was very great) into Asia, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of shippes together, as well in the coast of Bithynia, as also in the cite of Cyzicus, because he would haue an army by sea: and him selfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giuing audience vnto Princes and noble men of the contry that had to doe with him. Afterwards, he sent vnto Cassius in Syria, to turne him from his iorney into Aegypt, telling him that it was not for the conquest of any kingdom for them selues, that they wandered vp and downe in that sort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their contry againe to their libertie: and that the multitude of souldiers they gathered together, was to subdue the tyrannes that would keepe them in slavery and subiection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpose and intent, they should not be farre from Italy, as neare as they could possible, but should rather make all the haste they could, to helpe their contry men. Cassius beleued him, & returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the cite of Smyna, which was the first time that they saw together, since they tooke leaue eche of other, at the hauen of Piræa in Athens: the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were marvellous ioyfull, and no lesse coragious, when they saw the great armies together which they had both leauied: considering that they departing out of Italy, like naked and poore banished men, without armor and money, nor hauing any shippe ready, nor souldier about them, nor any one towne at their commaundement yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together, hauing shippes, money and souldiers enow, both footemen & horsemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Cassius would haue done Brutus as much honor, as Brutus did vnto him: but Brutus most commonly preuented him, and went first vnto him, both because he was the elder man, as also for that he was sickly of bodye. And men reputed him commonly to be very skillfull in warres, but otherwise marvellous chollerick and cruell, who sought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other side he was too familiar with his friends, and would leet too brodely with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valliantnes, was wellbeloued of the people and his owne, esteemed of noble men, and hated of no man, not so much as of his enemies: because he was a marvellous lowly and gentle person, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleasure and couetousnes, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wronge or iniustice, the which was the chiefe cause of his fame, of his rising, and of the good will that euery man bare him: for they were all perswaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleue, that if Pompey him selfe had ouercome Cæsar, he would haue resigned his authoritie to the law: but rather they were of opinion, that he would still keepe the souerainety and absolute gouernment in his hands, taking onely, to please the people, the title of Consul or Dictator, or of some other more ciuill office. And as for Cassius, a hot, chollerick, & cruell man, that would oftentimes be caried away from iustice for gayne: it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put him selfe into sundry dangers, more to haue absolute power and authoritie, then to defend the libertie of his contry. For, they that will also consider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, and Carbo: it is out of doubt that the ende and hope of their victorie, was to be Lordes of their contry: and in manner they did all confesse that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lordes of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary manner, his enemies them selues did neuer reprove Brutus, for any such change or desire. For, it was sayd that Antonius spake it openly diuers tymes, that he thought, that of all them that had slayne Cæsar, there was none but Brutus only that was moued to doe it, as thinking the acte commendable of it selfe: but that all the other conspirators did conspire his death, for some priuate malice or enuy, that they otherwise did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not trust so much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue: as is to be seene by his writings. For approaching neare to the instant danger, he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his assayes had the best happe that could be. For, sayd he, cyther I will set my contry at libertie by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certaine and assured of all things els, this one thing onely was doubtfull to them: whether they should liue or dye with libertie. He wrote also that Antonius had

A had his due payment for his folly. For where he might haue bene a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Cassius, and Cato, & haue made one with them: he liked better to chooſe to be ioynd with Octavianus Cæsar alone: with whom, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet shall he shortly after also haue warre with him. And truly he proued a true Prophet, for so came it in deede to passe. Now whilest Brutus and Cassius were together in the cite of Smyna: Brutus prayed Cassius to let him haue some part of his money whereof he had great store, because all that he could rappe and rend of his hide, he had bestowed it in making for great a number of shippes, that by meanes of them they should keepe all the sea at their commaundement. Cassius friendes hindered this request, and earnestly dissuaded him from it: perswading him, that it was no reason that Brutus should haue the money which Cassius had gotten together by sparing, and leauied with great euill will of the people their subiects, for him to bestowe liberally vpon his souldiers, and by this meanes to winne their good willes, by Cassius charge. This notwithstanding, Cassius gaue him the thirde parte of his totall summe. So Cassius and Brutus then departing from eche other, Cassius tooke the cite of Rhodes, where he too dishonestly & cruelly vsed him selfe: although when he came into the cite, he answered some of the inhabitants, who called him Lord and king, that he was nether Lord nor king, but he onely that had slaine him, that would haue bene Lord and king. Brutus departing from thence, sent vnto the Lycians, to require money, and men of warre. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell against him, in so much that the contry men of that contry kept the straights and litle mountaines, thinking by that meanes to stoppe Brutus C passage. Wherefore Brutus sent his horsemen against them, who stale vpon them as they were at dinner, and slue six hundred of them: and taking all the small townes and villages, he did let all the prisoners he tooke, goe without payment of ransom, hoping by this his great curtesie to winne them, to drawe all the rest of the contry vnto him. But they were so fierce and obstinate, that they would mutyne for euery small hurt they receyued as they passed by their contry, and did despite his curtesie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to beleege the cite of the Xanthians, within the which were shut vppe the cruelllest and most warrellest men of Lycia. There was a ryuer that ranne by the walls of the cite, in the which many men saued them selues, swimming betweene two waters, and fledde: howbeit they layed nettes ouerthwart the ryuer, and tyed litle bells on the toppe of them, to D sownd when any man was taken in the nettes. The Xanthians made a falye out by night, and came to fire certain engines of battery that bette downe their walls: but they were presently driuen in againe by the Romanes, so soone as they were discovered. The winde by chance was marvellous bygge, and increased the flame so sore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the cite, so that the next houses vnto them were straight set a fire thereby. Wherefore Brutus being affrayde that all the cite would take of a fire, he presently commaunded his men to quenche the fire, and to saue the towne if it might be. But the Lycians at that instant fell into such a frensie, and strange and horrible dispayre, that no man can well expresse it: and a man can not more rightly compare or lyken it, then to a frantick and most desperate desire to dye. For all of them together, with their wives E and children, Maisters and seruantes, and of all fortres of age whatsoever, fought vpon the ramper of their walles, and did cast downe stones and herworkes on the Romanes, which were very busie in quenching the flame of the fire, to saue the cite. And in contrary manner also, they brought fagotts, drye wodde, and reedes, to bringe the fire further into the cite as much as might bee, increasing it by suche thinges as they brought. Nowe when the fire had gotten into all the partes of the cite, and that the flame burnt bright in euery place: Brutus being sorie to see it, gotte vpon his horse, and rode rownde about the walles of the cite, to see if it were possible to saue it, and helde vppe his handes to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their cite, and to saue them selues. Howbeit they would not be perswaded, but did all that they could possible to cast them selues away F not onely men and women, but also litle children. For some of them weeping and crying out, did cast them selues into the fire: others headlong throwing them selues downe from the walles, brake their neckes: others also made their neckes bare, to the naked swordes of their fathers, and vndid their clothes, praying them to kill them their owne A handes. After the citie was burnt, they founde a woman hanged vppe by the necke, hold-ding one of her children in her hande deade by her, hanged vppe also: and in the other hande a burning torche setting fire on her house. Some woulde haue had Brutus to haue seene her, but he woulde not see so horrible and tragicall a sight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused a Herald to make proclamation by sound of trumpet, that he woulde giue a certaine summe of money, to euery souldier that could saue a XANTHIAN.

 So there were not (as it is reported) about fiftie of them saued, and yet they were saued against their willes. Thus the XANTHIANS hauing ended the reuolution of their fatall desti-nie, after a longe continuance of tyme: they did through their desperation, renue the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Auncestors. Who in like manner, in the warres B of the PERSIANS, did burne their citie, and destroyed them selues. Therefore Brutus likewise beseeching the citie of the PATARETANS, perceyuing that they stowly resisted him: he was also affrayde of that, and could not well tell whether he should giue assaunt to it, or not, least they woulde fall into the dispayre and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certaine of their women prisoners, he sent them backe agayne, without payment of ranfome. Nowe they that were the wiues and Daughters of the noblest men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had founde Brutus a mercifull, iuste, and courteous man: they perswaded them to yelde them selues and their citie vnto him, the which they did.
 So after they had thus yeldd them selues, diuers other citie also followed them, and did the like: and founde Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they should haue done, but specially farre about Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe same tyme, after he had compelled the RHODIANS euery man to deliuer all the ready money they had in gold and siluer in their houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eyght thousand talents: yet he condemned the citie besides, to paye the summe of fise hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leauyed of all the contrye of LYCIA but a hundred and fiftie talents onely: he departed thence into the contrye of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Nowe Brutus in all this iorney, did many notable actes and worthy of memorie, bothe for rewarding, as also in punishing those that had deser-ued it: Wherefore amongst the rest, I will tell you of one thinge, of the which he him selfe, and all the noble men of the ROMANES were maruelous glad. When Pompey the great (hauing lost the battell against Julius Caesar, in the felde of PHARSALIA) came and fell vpon the coast of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PELVSIUM: those that were protectors to the young king Ptolomy, beeing then but a childe, sare in counsell with his seruants and friends, what they should determine in that case. They were not all of one mynde in this consultation: for some thought it good to receyue Pompey, others also, that they should driue him out of ÆGYPT. But there was a certayne Rethoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Ile of CHIO, who was the kinges Schoolemaister to teache him Rethoricke. He beeing called to this counsell for lacke of sufficient men, sayde, that bothe the one and the other side went awrye, aswell those that were of opinion to receyue Pompey, as the other that woulde haue had him driuen awaye: and that the best waye was (considering the present tyme) that they should laye holde on him, and kill him, adding withall, this sentence, that a deade man byeth not. The whole counsell stucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey: Pompey the great was slayne, by the motion and counsell of this wicked Rethoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwardes did him selfe boast of it. But when Julius Caesar came afterwarde into ÆGYPT, the wicked men that consented to this counsell, had their payment according to their deserts: for they dyed euery man of them a wicked death, sauing this Theodotus, whome fortune respayred a litle while longer, and yet in that tyme he liued a poore and miserable life, neuer trying longe in any one place. So Brutus going vppe and downe ASIA, Theodotus could hyde him selfe no longer, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he suffered paines of death: F so that he wanne more fame by his deathe, then euer he did in his life. About that tyme, Brutus sent to praye Cassius to come to the citie of SARDIS, and so he did. Brutus

A vnderstanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There, both their atmies being armed, they called them both Emperors. Nowe, as it commonly happeneth in great affayres betweene two persons, both of them hauing many friends, and so many Captaines synder them: there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a litle chamber together, and bad euery man abyde, and did shut the doores to them. Then they beganne to powre out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and lowde, earnestly accusing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber hearing them lowd. wishin, and angry betweene them selues, they were both amased, and affrayd also lest it would grow to further matter: but yet they were commanded, that no man should come to them. Notwithstanding, one of Marcus Phaoisius, that had bene a friend and follower of Cato while he liued, & tooke vpon him to counterfeate a Philosopher, not with wisdom and discretion, but with a certaine bedlem and frantick motion: he would needes come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phaoisius, when a mad moode or toyed poeke him in the head: for he was a hot hasty man, & sodaine in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vfed this bold manner of speeche after the profession of the Cynick Philosophers, (as who would say, dogges) yet this boldnes did no hurt many times, because they did but laugh at him to see him so mad. This Phaoisius at that time, in despite of the doorekeepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine scoffing & mocking gettured which he counterfeated of purpose, he rehearsed the verses which old Neslor sayd in Homer in this manner:
 My Lords, I pray you hearken both to mee, For I haue seene more yeares than Iuche three.

Cassius fel a laughing at him: but Brutus thrust him out of the chamber, & called him dogge, and counterfeate Cynick. Howbeit his comming in brake their strife at that time, and so they left eche other. The selfe same night Cassius prepared his supper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his friendes with him. So when they were set at supper, Phaoisius came to sit downe after he had washed. Brutus tolde him alowd, no man sent for him, and bad them set him at the vpper end: meaning in deede at the lower end of the bed. Phaoisius made no ceremonie, but thrust in amongst the midst of them, and made all the companye laugh at him: So they were merry all supper tyme, and full of their Philosophie. The next daye after, Brutus vpon D complaynt of the SARDIANS, did condemne and noted Lucius Pella for a defamed person, that had bene a Prator of the ROMANES, and whome Brutus had giuen charge vnto: for that he was accused and conuicted of robberie, and pilferie in his office. This iudgement much misliked Cassius: because he him selfe had secretly (not many dayes before) warned two of his friends, attained and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them: but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of seruice as he did before. And therefore he greatly reprobued Brutus, for that he would shew him selfe so straight and seuerale in such a tyme, as was meete to beare a litle, then to take things at the worst. Brutus in contrary manner answered, that he should remember the Ides of Marche, at which tyme they slue Julius Caesar: who nether pilled nor polled the contrye, but onely was a fauourer and E suborner of all them that did robbe and spoyle, by his countenance and authoritie. And if there were any occasion whereby they might honestly sette aside iustice and equitie: they should haue had more reason to haue suffered Cesar's friendes, to haue robbed and done what wronge and iniurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then sayde he, they could but haue sayde they had bene cowards: and nowe they may accuse vs of iniustice, beside the paynes we take, and the daunger we put our selues into. And thus may we see what Brutus intent and purpose was. But as they both prepared to passe ouer againe, out of ASIA into EUROPE: there went a rumor that there appeared a wonderfull signe vnto him. Brutus was a careful man, and slept very litle, both for that his dyet was moderate, as also because he was continually occupied. He neuer slept in the day tyme, and in the night no longer, than the F tyme he was driuen to be alone, and when euery bodye els tooke their rest. But nowe whilest he was in warre, and his heade euer busily occupied to thinke of his affayres, and what would happen: after he had slumbered a litle after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his waightiest causes, and after he had taken order for them, if he had any le- A ure left him, he would read some booke till the third watche of the night, at what tyme the Captaines, pety Captaines and Colonells, did vse to come vnto him. So, being ready to goe into EVROPE, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet rest) as he was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of waighy matters: he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he saw a wonderfull strange and monstrous shap of a body comming towards him, and sayd neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god, or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The spirit answered him, I am thy euill spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus beeing no otherwise affrayd, replied againe vnto it: well, then I shall see thee agayne. The spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who tolde him that they heard no noyle, nor sawe any thinge at all. Thereupon Brutus returned agayne to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the daye brake, he went vnto Cassius, to tell him what vision had appeared vnto him in the night. Cassius beeing in opinion an EPICVRIAN, and reasoning thereon with Brutus, spake to him touching the vision thus. In our secte, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we doe not alwayes seele, or see, that which we suppose we doe both see and seele: but that our senses beeing credulous, and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne objects) are induced to imagine they see and conie-cture that, which they in truth doe not. For, our minde is quick and cunning to worke (without eyther cause or matter) any thinge in the imagination whatsoever. And therefore the imagination is resembled to claye, and the minde to the potter: who without any other cause than his fancie and pleasure, chaungeth it into what facion and forme he will. And this doth the diuersitie of our dreames shewe vnto vs. For our imagination doth vpon a small fancie growe from conceit to conceit, altering both in passions and formes of things imagined. For the minde of man is euer occupied, and that continuall mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholicke discouraging, and of late continually occupied: your wittes and fences haue bene ouerlabored, doe easilier yeelde to such imaginations. For, to say that there are spirits or angells, and if there were, that they had the shap of men, or such voyces, or any power at all to come vnto vs: it is a mockerie. And for myne owne parte, I would there were suche, bicause that we shoulde not onely haue souldiers, horses, and shippes, but also the ayde of the goddes, to guide and further our honest and honorable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they rayled their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a marvelous force, lighted vpon two of the foremoste ensignes, and alwayes followed the souldiers, which gaue them meate, and fedde them, vntill they came neare to the citie of PHILIPPES: and there one daye onely before the battell, they bothe flew away. Now Brutus had conquered the moste parte of all the people, and nations of that contry: but if there were any other citie or Captaine to ouer-come, then they made all cleere before them, and so drew towards the coasts of THASSOS.

 There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called SYMBOLON: (which is a port of the sea) Cassius and Brutus compassed him in in such fort, that he was driuen to forsake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in daunger beside to haue lost all his armye. For, Octavius Caesar could not followe him bicause of his sickness, and therefore stayed behind: whereupon they had taken his army, had not Antonius ayde bene, which made such wonderful speede, that Brutus could scant beleue it. So Caesar came not thither of ten daies after: & Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on thother side against Caesar. The ROMANES called the valley betweene both campes, the PHILIPPAN fields: and there were neuer seene two so great armies of the ROMANES, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferior to Octavius Caesars, in number of men: but for brauery and rich furniture, Brutus army farre excelled Caesars. For the most part of their armors were siluer and gilt, which Brutus had bountifully giuen them: although in all other things he taught his Captaines to lye in order without excess. But for the brauery of armor, & weapo, which souldiers should cary in their hands, or otherwise weare vpon their backs: he thought

A that it was an encouragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, & that it maketh them also fight like deuills that loue to get, and be affrayd to lose: bicause they fight to keepe their armor and weapon, as also their goods and lands. Now when they came to muster their armies, Octavius Caesar tooke the muster of his army within the trenches of his campe, & gaue his men onely a litle corne, and fise siluer Drachmas to euery man to sacrifice to the gods, & to pray for victory. But Brutus skorning this miserie and niggardlines, first of all mustered his armie, and did purifie it in the fields, according to the manner of the ROMANES: and then he gaue vnto euery band a number of weathers to sacrifice, and fise siluer Drachmas to euery souldier. So that Brutus and Cassius souldiers were better pleased, and more coragiously bent to fight at the daye of the battell, then their enemies souldiers were. Notwithstanding, being busily occupied about the ceremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chaunted certaine vnlike signes vnto Cassius. For one of his Sergeants that caried the rodde before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backwards, the which he shoulde haue worne on his head in the tyme of sacrificing. Moreouer it is reported also, that at another tyme before, in certaine sportes and triumph where they caried an image of Cassius victorie of cleane gold, it fell by chaunce, the man stumbling that caried it. And yet further, there were seene a marvelous number of fowles of praye, that feede vpon dead carcases: and beehiues also were founde, where bees were gathered together in a certaine place within the trenches of the campe: the which place the Soothsayers thought good to shut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the superstitious feare and mistrust men would haue of it. The which beganne somewhat to alter Cassius minde from Epicurus opinions, and had put the souldiers also in a marvelous feare. Thereupon Cassius was of opinion not to trye this warre at one battell, but rather to delay tyme, and to drawe it out in length, considering that they were the stronger in money, and the weaker in men and armors. But Brutus in contrary manner, did al-way before, and at that tyme also, desire nothing more, then to puttall to the hazard of battell, asloone as might be possible: to the ende he might either quickly restore his contry to her former libertie, or rid him forthwith of this miserable world, being still troubled in following and bykerings they made, his men were alway the stronger, and euer had the better: that yet quickened his spirits agayne, and did put him in better hart. And furthermore, bicause that some of their owne men had already yelded them selues to their enemies, and that it was suspected moreouer diuers others would doe the like: that made many of Cassius friendes, which were of his minde before, (when it came to be debated in counsell whether the battell shoulde be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus minde. But yet was there one of Brutus friendes called Atellius, that was against it, and was of opinion that they should ray the next winter.
Brutus asked him what he shoulde get by tarying a yeare longer? If I get nought els, & Atellius agayne, yet haue I liued so much longer. Cassius was very angry with this answer: and Atellius was maliced and esteemed the worse for it of all men. Thereupon it was presently determined they should fight battell the next daye. So Brutus all supper tyme looked with a cheerefull countenance, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wisely of Philosophy, and after supper went to bed. But touching Cassius, Messala reporteth that he supped by him selfe in his tent with a fewe of his friendes, and that all supper tyme he looked very sadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was against his nature: and that after supper he tooke him by the hande, and holding him fast (in token of kindness as his manner was) tolde him in Greeke: Messala, I protest vnto thee, and make thee my witnes, that I am compelled against my minde and will (as Pompey the great was) to jeopard the libertie of our contry, to the hazard of a battell. And yet we must be liuely, and of good corage, considering our good fortune, whome we shoulde wronge too muche to mistrust her, although we followe euill counsell.
Messala writeth, that Cassius hauing spoken these last wordes vnto him, he bad him farewell, and willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, bicause it was his birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the signall of battell was let out in Brutus and Cassius campe, which was an arming scarlet coate: and both the Chieftaines spake together in the middest of their armies. There Cassius beganne to speake first, and sayd: the gods graunt vs, O before the battell.

Brutus, that this day we may winne the field, and euer after to liue all the rest of our life quietly, one with another. But sith the gods haue so ordeined it, that the greatest & chiefeſt things amongst men are most vncertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwise to daye then we wishe or looke for, we shall hardly meete againe: what art thou then determined to doe, to flye, or dye? Brutus answered him, being yet but a young man, and not ouergreatly experienced in the world: I trust, (I know not how) a certaine rule of Philosophie, by the which I did greatly blame and reprove Cato for killing of him selfe, as being no lawfull nor godly acte, touching the gods, nor concerning men, valliant, not to giue place and yeld to diuine providence, and not constantly and patiently to take whatsoever it please him to fend vs, but to drawe backe, and fie: but being now in the midst of the daunger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God, that this battell fall out fortunate for vs: I will looke no more for hope, neither seeke to make any new supply for warre againe, but will rid me of this miserable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my contry in the Ides of Marche, for the which I shall liue in another more glorious worlde. Cassius fell a laughing to heare what he sayde, and embracing him, come on then sayde he, let vs goe and charge our enemies with this mynde. For eyther we shall conquer, or we shall not neede to feare the Conquerors. After this talke, they fell to consultation amongst their friends for the ordering of the battell. Then Brutus prayed Cassius he might haue the leading of the right winge, the which men thought was farre meetter for Cassius: both because he was the elder man, and also for that he had the better experience. But yet Cassius gaue it him, and willed that Messala (who had charge of one of the warrelkett legions they had) shoulde be also in that winge with Brutus: So Brutus presently sent out his horsemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his footemen also were as willing and ready to giue charge. Nowe Antonius men did cast a trenche from the marſhe by the which they laye, to cutte of Cassius way to come to the sea: and Cesar, at the least his armye, styrred not. As for Octavius Caesar him selfe, he was not in his campe, because he was sicke. And for his people, they litle thought the enemies would haue giuen them battell, but only haue made some light skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the trenche, and with their darts and slings to haue kept them from finishing of their worke: but they taking no heede to them that came full vpon them to giue them battell, maruelled much at the grear noyse they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their trenche. In the meane tyme Brutus that led the right winge, sent litle billes to the Colonells and Captaines of priuate bandes, in the which he wrote the worde of the battell: and he him selfe riding a horse backe by all the trowpes, did speake to them, and incouraged them to sticke to it like men. So by this means very fewe of them vnderstoode what was the worde of the battell, and besides, the moste parte of them neuer taryed to haue it tolde them, but ranne with greate furie to assaile the enemies: whereby through this disorder, the legions were maruelously scattered and dispersed one from the other. For first of all, Messala's legion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left winge of the enemies, and did nothing, but glawnsing by them, ouerthrew some as they went, and so going on further, fell right vpon Cesar's campe, out of the which (as him selfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a litle before, thorough the counsell and aduise of one of his friendes called Marcus Antonius: Who dreaming in the night, had a vision appeared vnto him, that commaunded Octavius Caesar should be caried out of his campe. Inſomuch as it was thought he was slayne, because his lytter (which had nothing in it) was thrust through & through with pykes and darts. There was great slaughter in this campe. For amongst others, there were slayne two thousand Lacedemonians, who were arriued but euen a litle before, coming to ayde Cesar. The other also that had not glawnsed by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cesar's battell: they easily made them fie, because they were greatly troubled for the losse of their campe, and of them there were slayne by hand, three legions. Then being very earnest to followe the chafe of them that fled, they ranne in amongst them handouer head into their campe, & Brutus amongst the But that which the conquerors thought not of, occasion shewed it vnto them that were ouercome: & that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked, & vngarded of the of the right wing, who were strayed too far off, in following ing of them that were ouerthrowen. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But notwithstanding all the force they made, they could not breake into the midst of their battell, where they founde men that receiued them, and valliantly made head against them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrew the left wing where Cassius was, by reason of the great disorder amongst them, and also because they had no intelligence how the right wing had fled. So they chafed them beating them into their campe, the which they spoyled, none of both the Chieftaines being present there. For Antonius, as it is reported, to ſie the furie of the first charge, was gotten into the next marſh: and no man coulde tell what became of Octavius Caesar, after he was caried out of his campe. Inſomuche that there were certaine ſouldiers that shewed their ſwords bloodied, & sayd that they had slaine him, and did deſcribe his face, and shewed what age he was of. Furthermore the vaward, and the midst of Brutus's battell, had ſlew all their enemies to flight that withſtoode them, with great slaughter: so that Brutus had conquered all of his ſide, and Cassius had loſt all on the other ſide. For nothing vndid them, but that Brutus went not to helpe Cassius, thinking he had ouercome them, as him ſelfe had done: and Cassius on the other ſide taryed not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowen, as him ſelfe was. And to proue that the victorie fell on Brutus's ſide, Messala confirmeth it: that they wanne three Eagles, and diuers other enſignes of their enemies, and their enemies wanne neuer one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chafe, after he had ſlaine and ſacked Cesar's men: he wondred much that he coulde not ſee Cassius tent ſtanding vp high as it was wont, neither the other tentes of his campe ſtanding as they were before, because all the whole cape had bene ſpoiled, and the tentes throwen downe, at the first coming in of the enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whoſe ſight ſerued them better, tolde him that they ſawe a great glittering of harnes, and a number of ſiluered targets, that went & came into Cassius's campe, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to gard the campe: and yet that they ſaw not ſuch a number of dead bodies, and great ouerthrow, as there ſhould haue bene, if ſo many legions had bene ſlaine. This made Brutus at the first miſtruſt that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemy which he had taken, and cauſed his men to be ſent for that yet followed the chafe, and gathered them together, thinking to lead them to aide Cassius, who was in this ſtate as you ſhall heare. First of all he was maruelous angrie, to ſee how Brutus's men ranne to geue charge vpon their enemies, and taryed not for the word of the battell, nor commaundement to geue charge: and it grieved him beſide, that after he had ouercome them, his men ſell ſtraight to ſpoyle, and were not careful to compaſſe in the reſt of the enemies behinde. But with tarying too long alſo, more then through the valliantneſſe or foreſight of the Captaines his enemies: Cassius founde him ſelfe compaſſed in with the right wing of his enemies armie. Whereuppon his horſemen brake immediately, and fled for life towards the ſea. Furthermore, perceiving his footemen to geue ground, he did what he coulde to keepe them from flying, and tooke an enſigne from one of the enſigne bearers that fled, and ſtucke it ſtill at his ſeete: although with much a do he coulde ſcant keepe his owne gard together. So Cassius him ſelfe was at length compelled to ſie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might eaſely ſee what was done in all the plaine: howbeit Cassius him ſelfe ſawe nothing, for his ſight was verie bad, ſauiug that he ſaw (and yet with much a doe) how the enemies ſpoiled his campe before his eyes. He ſawe alſo a great troupe of horſemen, whom Brutus ſent to aide him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he ſent Titinius, one of them that was with him, to goe and know what they were. Brutus's horſemen ſawe him comming a farre off, whom they knewe that he was one of Cassius's chiefeſt friendes, they ſhowed out for ioy: and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horſes, and went and embraced him. The reſt compaſſed him in rounde about a horſebacke, with ſongs of victorie and great ruſhing of their harnes, ſo that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all. For Cassius thinking in deede that Titinius was taken of the enemies, he then ſpake theſe wordes: deſiring too much to liue, I haue liued to ſee one of my beſt friendes taken, for my ſake, before my face. After that, he gotte into a tent where no bodie was, and tooke Pyndarus with him, one of his freed bondmen, whom he reſerued euier for suche a pinche, since the cursed battell of the P^{ART}HIANS, where Crassus was slaine, A though he notwithstanding escaped from that ouerthrow: but then casting his cloke ouer his head, & holding out his bare neck vnto Pindarus, he gaue him his head to be stricken of. So the head was found seuered from the bodie: but after that time Pindarus was neuer seene more. Whereupon, some tooke occasion to say, that he had slaine his master without his commaundement. By & by they knew the horsemen that came towards them, & might see Tiunnius crowned with a garland of triumphe, who came before with great speede vnto Cassius. But when he perceived by the cries and teares of his friends which tormented them selues, the misfortune that had chanced to his Captaine Cassius, by mistaking: he drew out his sword, cuning him selfe a thousand times that he had taried so long, and so slue him selfe presentlie in the fildes. Brutus in the meane time came forward still, and vnderstoode also that Cassius had bene ouer- B thrown: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came verie neere to his campe. So when he was come thither, after he had lamented the death of Cassius, calling him the last of all the ROMANES, being vnpossible that ROME should euier breede againe so noble & valliant a man as he: he caufed his bodie to be buried, and sent it to the cite of Thassos, fearing least his funerals within the campe should cause great disorder. Then he called his souldiers together, & did encourage them againe. And when he saw that they had lost all their cariage, which they could not brooke well: he promised euerie man of them two thousand Drachmas in recompence. After his souldiers had heard his Oration, they were al of them prettily cheered againe, wondering much at his great liberalitie, and waited vpon him with great cries when he went his way, praising him, for that he only of the foure Chieftaines, was not ouercome in battell. And to speake the truth, his deedes shewed that he hoped not in vaine to be conqueror. For with few legions, he had slaine and driuen all them away, that made head against him: and yet if all his people had fought, and that the most of them had not outgone their enemies to runne to spoyle their goods: surely it was like enough he had slaine them all, and had left neuer a man of them alive. There were slaine of Brutus side, about eight thousand men, counting the souldiers slaues, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies side, as Messala wryteth, there were slaine as he supposeth, more then twice as many more. Wherefore they were more discouraged then Brutus, vntill that verie late at night, there was one of Cassius men called Demetrius, who went vnto Antonius, and caried his maisters clothes, whereof he was stripped not long before, and his sword also. This encouraged Brutus enemies, and made them so braue, D that the next morning betimes they stood in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus side, both his campes stood wauering, and that in great danger. For his owne campe being full of prisoners, required a good garde to looke vnto them: and Cassius campe on the other side tooke the death of their Captaine verie heauilie, and beside, there was some vile grudge betwene them that were ouercome, and those that did ouercome. For this cause therefore Brutus did fret them in battell ray, but yet kept him selfe from geuing battell. Now for the slaues that were prisoners, which were a great number of them, & went & came to and fro amongst the armed men, not without suspicion: he commaunded they shoulde kill them. But for the freemen, he sent them freely home, and said, that they were better prisoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were slaues and seruantes: and with him, they were free E men, and citizens. So when he saw that diuers Captaines and his frendes did so cruelly hate some, that they would by no means saue their liues: Brutus him selfe hid them, and secretlie sent them away. Among these prisoners, there was one Volumnius a leafer, and Succellus a common player, of whom Brutus made no accompt at all. Howbeit his frends brought them vnto him, and did accue them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to scorn, and to ieast broadly with them. Brutus made no aunswere to it, because his heade was occupied otherways. Whereupon, Messala Corninus sayd: that it were good to whippe them on a scaffold, and then to sende them naked, well whipped, vnto the Captaines of their enemies, to shewe them their shame, to keepe suche mates as those in their campe, to play the fooles, to make them sport. Some that stood by, laughed at his deuise. But Publius Casca, that gaue Inlius Caesar the first wound when he was slaine, sayd then: It doth not become vs to be thus merie at Cassius funerals: and for thee, Brutus, thou shalt shewe what estimation thou F madeit,

A madeit of suche a Captaine thy compere, by putting to death, or sauing the liues of these bloodes, who hereafter will mocke him, and defame his memorie. Brutus aunswere againe in choller: why then doe you come to tell me of it, Casca, and doe not your selues what you thinke good? When they hearde him say so, they tooke his aunswere for a consent against these poore vnfortunate men, to suffer them to doe what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, & slue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promise he had made to the souldiers, and gaue them the two thousand Drachmas a peece, but yet he first reproved them, because they went & gaue charge vpon the enemies at the first battell, before they had the word of battell geuen them: and made them a new promise also, that if in the second battell they fought like men, he would geue them the sacke and spoyle of two cities; to wit, B Thessalonica, and Lacedæmon. In all Brutus life there is but this only fault to be found; and that is not to be gaineisaid: though Antonius and Octavius Caesar did reward their souldiers farre worfe for their victory. For when they had driuen all the naturall ITALIANS out of ITALIE, they gaue their souldiers their landes and townes, to the which they had no right: and moreover, the only marke they shott at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome, and raigene. Where in contrarie manner they had so great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voyce and opinion of the world would not suffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to saue him selfe, otherwise then iustlie and honestly, and speciallie after Cassius death: whome men burdened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great crueltie. But nowe, like as the mariners on the sea after the rudder of their shippe is broken by tempest, do seeke to naile on some C other peece of wodde in lieu thereof, and doe helpe them selues to keepe them from hurt, as much as may be vpon that instant daunger: euen so Brutus, hauing such a great armie to gouerne, and his affaires standing verie tickle, and hauing no other Captaine coequall with him in dignitie and authoritie: he was forced to employ them he had, and likewise to be ruled by them in many things, & was of mind him selfe also to graunt them any thing, that he thought might make them ferue like no souldiers at time of neede. For Cassius souldiers were verie euill to be ruled, and did shewe them selues verie stubborne and lustie in the campe, because they had no Chieftaine that did commaund them: but yet rancke cowards to their enemies, because they had once ouercome them. On the other side Octavius Caesar, and Antonius, were not in much better state: for first of all, they lacked vittells. And because they were lodged in low D places, they looked to abide a hard and sharpe winter, being camped as they were by the marsh side, and also for that after the battell there had fallen plentie of raine about the autumne, where through, all their tents were full of myre and durt, the which by reason of the colde did freeze incontinently. But beside all these discommodities, there came newes vnto them of the great losse they had of their men by sea. For Brutus shippes met with a great aide and sup- E plie of men, which were sent them out of ITALIE, and they ouerthrew them in suche sorte, that there escaped but few of them: and yet they were so furnished, that they were compelled to eate the tackle and sailes of their shippes. Thereupon they were verie desirous to fight a battell againe, before Brutus should haue intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced so, that the battell was fought by sea, on the selfe same day it was fought by lande. But by E ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the Capraines, this victory came not to Brutus care, till twentie dayes after. For had he knownen of it before, he would not haue bene brought to haue fought a second battell, considering that he had excellent good prouision for his armie for a long time, and besides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his campe could not be greatly hurt by the winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had bene a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by sea, as he was also by land. This would haue maruelously encouraged him. Howbeit the state of ROME (in my opinion) being now brought to that passe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lordes, but required one only absolute Gouvernor: God, to preuent Brutus that it shoulde not come to his government, kept this victory from his knowledge, though in deepe it came but a litle too late. For the day before the last battell was geuen, verie late in the night, came Clodius, one of his enemies into his campe, who told that Caesar hearing of the ouerthrow of his armie by sea, desired nothing more then to fight a battell before Brutus vnderstoode it. Howbeit they gaue no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they would not vouchsafe to bring him vnto Brutus, A because they thought it was but a lye deuised, to be the better welcome for this good newes.

 The selfe same night, it is reported that the monstrous spirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the cite of SARDIS, did now appeare againe vnto him in the selfe same shape and forme, and so vanished away, and sayd neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a graue & wife Philosopher, that had bene with Brutus from the beginning of this warre, he doth make mention of this spirite, but sayth: that the greatest Eagle and ensigne was couered ouer with a swarme of bees, and that there was one of the Capitaines, whose arme sodainly fell a sweating, that it dropped oyle of roses from him, and that they oftentimes went about to drie him, but all would doe no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a maruelous great silence all the valley ouer, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight between them: and that in the end, the Eagle towards Brutus gaue ouer, and flew away. But this is certaine, and a true tale: that when the gate of the campe was open, the first man the stander bearer met that caried the Eagle, was an ETHIOPIAN, whome the souldiers for ill lucke mangled with their swordes. Now, after that Brutus had brought his armie into the felde; and had set them in battell ray, directlie against the vaward of his enemy: he pawled a long time, before he gaue the signall of battell. For Brutus rising vp and downe to view the bands and companies: it came in his head to mistrust some of them, besides, that some came to tell him so much as he thought. Moreouer, he sawe his horsemen set forward but faintly, and did not goe lustily to geue charge: but still stayed, to see what the footemen would doe. Then sodainly, one of the chiefeft Knights he had in all his armie called Camulatus, and that was alway maruelously esteemed of for his valliantnes, vntill that time: he came hard by Brutus a horsebacke, and roade before his face to yeld him selfe vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruelous sorie for it, wherefore partly for anger, and partly for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he sodainly caused his armie to marche, being past three of the clocke in the after noone. So in that place where he him selfe fought in person, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gaue him way, through the helpe of his horsemen that gaue charge with his foremen; when they saw the enemies in a maze, and affrayed. Howbeit the other also on the right wing, when the Capitaines would haue had them to haue marched: they were affraid to haue bene compassed in behinde, because they were fewer in number then their enemies, D and therefore did spred them selues, and leaue the middest of their battell. Whereby they having weakened them selues, they could not withstande the force of their enemies, but turned taile straight, and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight vpon it to compasse Brutus behinde, who in the middest of the conflict, did all that was possible for a skilfull Capitaine and valliant souldier: both for his wisdom, as also for his hardinesse, for the obtaining of victorie. But that which wanne him the victorie at the first battell, did now lose it him at the seconde. For at the first time, the enemies that were broken and fled, were straight cut in peeces: but at the seconde battell, of Cassius men that were put to flight, there were fewe slaine: and they that faued them selues by speede, being affrayed because they had bene overcome, did discourage the rest of the armie when they came to ioyne with them, & filled all the army with feare & disorder. There was the sonne of M. Cato slaine, valliantly fighting amongst the lustie youths. For, notwithstanding that he was verie wearie, and overharried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling alowde his name, and also his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe amongst many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had slaine rounde about him. So there were slaine in the field, all the chiefeft gentlemen and nobilitie that were in his armie: who valliantlie ranne into any danger, to saue Brutus life. Amongst them there was one of Brutus frendes called Lucilius, who seeing a troupe of barbarous men making no reckoning of all men else they met in their way, but going all together right against Brutus, he determined to stay them with the hazard of his life, and being left behinde, told them that he was Brutus: and because they should beleue him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he sayd he was affrayed of Casus, and that he did trust Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good happe, and thinking

A them selues happie men: they caried him in the night, and sent some before vnto Antonius, to tell him of their coming. He was maruelous glad of it, and went out to meete them that brought him. Others also vnderstanding of it, that they had brought Brutus prisoner: they came out of all parts of the campe to see him, some pitying his hard fortune, & others saying, that it was not done like him selfe so cowardlie, to be taken aliue of the barbarous people, for feare of death. When they came neere together, Antonius stayed a while, bethinking him selfe how he should vse Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who slowly with a bold countenance sayd, Antonius, I dare assure thee, that no enemy hath taken, nor shall take Marcus Brutus aliue: and I beseech God keepe him from that fortune. For where soeuer he be found, aliue or dead: he will be found like him selfe. And nowe for my selfe, I am come vnto thee, hauing deceiued these men of armes here, bearing them downe that I was Brutus: and doe not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius wordes made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other side, looking vpon all them that had brought him, sayd vnto them: my companions, I thinke ye are sorie you haue failed of your purpose, & that you thinke this man hath done you great wrong: but I doe assure you, you haue taken a better bootie, then that you followed. For, in steade of an enemy, you haue brought me a friend: and for my parte, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truely I can not tell what I should haue done to him. For, I had rather haue such men my frendes, as this man here, then enemies.
 Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time deliuered him to one of his frendes in custodie, and Lucilius euer after serued him faithfullie, euen to his death. Nowe Brutus hauing passed a little riuier, walled in on either side with hie rockes, and shadowed with great trees, being then darke night, he went no further, but stayed at the foote of a rocke with certaine of his Cap-itaines and frendes that followed him: and looking vp to the firmament that was full of starres, sighing, he rehearsed two verses. of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect,

Let not the weight from vrbom this mischiefe vrent (O Ioue) escape without deere punishment.

And sayth that he had forgotten the other. Within a litle while after, naming his frendes that he had seene slaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater sigh then before: specially, when he came to name Labio, and Flauius, of the which the one was his Lieutenant, and the other, Capitaine of the pioneers of his campe. In the meane time, one of the companie being a thirst, and seeing Brutus a thirst also: he ranne to the riuier for water, and brought it in his fallet. At the selfe same time they heard a noyse on the other side of the riuier. Wherevpon Volumnius tooke Dardanius, Brutus seruauant with him, to see what it was: and returning straight againe, asked if there were any water left. Brutus smiling, gentlie tolde them all was dronke, but they shall bring you some more. Therevpon he sent him againe that went for water before, who was in great daunger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly escaped, being fore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought that there was no great number of men slaine in battell, and to know the trueth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promised to goe through his enemies (for otherwise it was impossible to goe fee their campe) and from thence if all were well, that he would lift vp a torche light in the ayer, and then returne againe with speede to E him. The torche light was lift vp as he had promised, for Statilius went thither. Nowe Brutus seeing Statilius tarie long after that, and that he came not againe, he sayd: if Statilius be aliue, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was such, that as he came backe, he lighted in his enemies hands, and was slaine. Now, the night being farre spent, Brutus as he sat bowed towards Clitus one of his men, and told him somewhat in his eare, the other aunswered him not, but fell a weeping. Therevpon he proued Dardanius, and sayd fom what alo to him: at length he came to Volumnius him selfe, & speaking to him in Graeke, prayed him for the studies sake which brought them acquainted together, that he would helpe him to put his hande to his sword, to thrust it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others:
 and amongst the rest, one of them sayd, there was no tarying for them there, but that they F must needs flie. Then Brutus rising vp, we must flie in deede sayd he, but it must be with our hands, not with our feete. Then taking euery man by the hand, he sayd these words vnto them with a cheerefull countenance, It reioyceth my hart that not one of my frends hath failed me at my neede, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but only for my contries sake: for, as for A me, I thinke my selfe happier than they that haue ouercome, considering that I leaue a perpetuall fame of our courage and manhoode, the which our enemies the conquerors shall neuer attaine vnto by force nor money, neither can let their posteritie to say, that they being naughtie and vniust men, haue slaine good men, to vsurpe tyrannical power not pertaining to them. Hauing sayd so, he prayed euerie man to shif for them selues, and then he went a litle aside with two or three only, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the studie of Rethoricke. He came as neere to him as he coulde, and taking his sword by the hilts with both his hands, & falling downe vpon the poynt of it, ran him selfe through. Others say, that not he, but Strato (at his request) held the sword in his hand, & turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it: and so ranne him selfe through, and dyed presently. Messala, that had bene Brutus great frend, became afterwards Octavius Cæsars frend. So, shortly after, Cæsar being at good leasure, he brought Strato, Brutus frende vnto him, and weeping sayd: Cæsar, beholde, here is he that did the last seruice to my Brutus. Cæsar welcomed him at that time, and afterwards he did him as faithfull seruice in all his affaires, as any Grecian els he had about him, vntill the battell of ACTIUM. It is reported also, that this Messala him selfe answered Cæsar one day, when he gaue him great praise before his face, that he had fought valliantlie, and with great affection for him, at the battell of ACTIUM: (notwithstanding that he had bene his cruell enemy before, at the battell of PHILIPPS, for Brutus sake) I euer loued, sayd he, to take the best and iustest parte. Now, Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie, he caused it to be wrapped vp in one of the richest cote armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius vnderstanding that this cotearmor was stollen, he put the theefe to death that had stollen it, & sent the ashes of his bodie vnto Servilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife: Nicolaus the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus doe wryte, that she determining to kill her selfe (her parents and frendes carefullie looking to her to kepe her from it) tooke hotte burning coles, and cast them into her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choked her selfe. There was a letter of Brutus found wrytten to his frendes, complayning of their negligence, that his wife being sicke, they would not helpe her, but suffred her to kill her selfe, choosing to dye, rather then to languish in paine. Thus it appeareth, that Nicolaus knewe not well that time, sith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the diseafe and loue of this Lady, and also the manner of her death.

THE COMPARISON OF Dion with Brutus.

A Come nowe to compare these two noble personages together, it is certaine that both of them hauing had great gifts in them (& specially Dion) of small occasions they made them selues great men: & therfore Dion of both deserueth chiefeft praise. For, he had no cohelper to bring him vnto that greatnesse, as Brutus had of Cassius: who doubtlesse was not comparable vnto Brutus, for vertue and respect of honor, though otherwise in matters of warre, he was no lesse wife and valliant then he. For many doe impute vnto Cassius, the first beginning and originall of all the warre and enterprife: and sayd it was he that did encourage Brutus, to conspire Cæsars death. Where Dion furnished him selfe with armor, shippes and souldiers and wanne those frendes and companions also that did helpe him, to prosecute his warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who rose to greatnesse by his enterprises, and by warre got all his strength and riches. But he in contrarie maner, spent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his contrie and disbursed of his owne money, that should haue kept him in his banishment. Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessity to make warres, bicause they coulde not haue liued safelie in peace, when they were driuen out of ROME: for that they were condemned to death, and pursued by their enemies. And for this cause therefore they were driuen to hazard them selues in warre, more for their owne safetie, then for the libertie of their contrie men. Whereas Dion on the other side, liuing more merily and safelie in his banishment, then the tyranne Dionysius him selfe that had banished him: did put him selfe to that daunger, to deliuer SICILE from bondage. Nowe the matter was not a like vnto the ROMANES, to be deliuered from the government of Cæsar: as it was for the SYRACVSANS, to be ridde of Dionysius tyrannie. For Dionysius denied not, that he was not a tyranne, hauing filled SICILE with suche miserie and calamitie. Howebeit Cæsars power and government when it came to be established, did in deede much hurt at his first entrie and beginning vnto those that did resist him: but afterwards, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his government, it seemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyranne, then otherwise that he was so in deede. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall nor cruell act, but contrarie, it seemed that he was a mercifull Philition, whom God had ordeyned of speciall grace to be Gouvernor of the Empire of ROME, and to set all things againe at quiet stay, the which required the counsell and authoritie of an absolute Prince. And therefore the ROMANES were maruelous sorie for Cæsar after he was slaine, and afterwards would neuer pardon them that had slaine him. On the other side, the cause why the SYRACVSANS did most accule Dion, was: bicause he did let Dionysius escape out of the castell of SYRACVS, and bi-cause he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombe of his father. Furthermore, towching the warres: Dion alway shewed him selfe a Capitaine vnreprouable, hauing wiselike and skilfullie taken order for those things, which he had enterprised of his owne head and counsell: and did amende the faults others committed, and brought things to better state then he found them. Where it seemeth, that Brutus did not wisely to receiue the second battell: considering his rest stode vpon it. For, after he had lost the battell, it was vnpossible for him euer to rise againe: & therefore his hart failed him, and so gaue vp all, and neuer durst strue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, considering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his souldiers, and being before a dreadfull Lorde all the sea ouer. Furthermore, the greatest reproache they could obiect against Brutus, was: that Julius Caesar hauing saued his life, and pardoned all the prisoners also taken in battell, as many as he had made request for, taking him for his frende, B and honoring him aboue all his other frends: Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his blood, wherewith they could neuer reprove Dion. For on the contrarie side, so long as Dion was Diomysius frende and kinsman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was banished his contrie, and that his wife was forcible married to another man, and his goodes also taken from him: then he entred into iust and open warres against Diomysius the tyranne. But in this poynt, they were contrarie together. For wher in their chiefest praise consisted, to witte, in hating of tyrannes and wicked men: it is most true that Brutus desire was most sincere of both. For hauing no priuate cause of complaint or grudge against Caesar, he ventred to kill him, only to set his contrie againe at libertie. Where if Dion had not receiued priuate cause of quarrell against Diomysius: he woulde neuer haue C caused warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epistells, where is plainlie seene: that Dion being driuen out of the tyrans Court against his will, and not putting him selfe to voluntarie banishment, he draue out Diomysius. Furthermore, the respect of the common wealth caused Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemy, to become his frende, and enemy vnto Caesar, that before was his frend: only referring his friendshippe and enmitie, vnto the consideration of iustice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Diomysius sake and benefit, all the while he trusted him: and when he beganne to mistrust him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his frendes did not beleue, but after he had driuen out Diomysius, he would establish the government to him selfe, flattering the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the name of a tyranne. But for Brutus, his verie enemies them selues confessed, that of all D those that conspired Caesars death, he only had no other ende and intent to attempt his enterprise, but to restore the Empire of Rome againe, to her former state & government. And furthermore, it was not all one thing to deale with Diomysius, as it was to haue to doe with Julius Caesar. For no man that knew Diomysius, but would haue despised him, considering that he spent the most parte of his time in drinking, dycing, and in haunting lewde womens company. But to haue vnderaken to destroy Julius Caesar, and not to haue throncke backe for feare of his great wisdom, power, and fortune, considering that his name only was dreadfull vnto euerie man, and also not to suffer the kings of PARTHIA and INDIA to be in rest for him: this could not come but of a maruelous noble minde of him, that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his corage. And therefore, so fone as Dion came into SICILIA, many thousandes of men E came and ioyned with him, against Diomysius. But the fame of Julius Caesar did set vp his frends againe after his death, and was of such force, that it raised a young tripling, Octavius Caesar, (that had no meanes nor power of him selfe) to be one of the greatest men of Rome: and they vsed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will say, that Dion draue out the tyrant Diomysius with force of armes, and sundrie battells: and that in contrarie maner Brutus slue Caesar, being a naked man, and without gard: then doe I aunswere againe, that it was a noble parte, and of a wise Capitaine, to choose so apt a time and place, to come vpon a man of so great power, and to finde him naked without his gard. For he went not sodainlie in a rage, and alone, or with a small companie, to assaile him: but his enterprise was long time before determined of, and that with diuers men, of all the which, F not a man of them once sayled him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chose them honest men, or else that by his choise of them, he made them good men.

Whereas

In what things Dion was inferior vnto Brutus.

A Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wise choise in trusting of euill men, or else because he could not tell how to vie them he had chosen of good men, he made them become euill, so that neither the one nor the other coulde be the parte of a wise man. For Plato him selfe reproveth him, for that he had chosen suche men for his frendes, that he was slaine by them, and after he was slaine, no man woulde then reuenge his death. And in contrarie manner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) gaue his bodie honorable buriall: and Octavius Caesar the other, referred his honors and memories of him. For at Milayne, (a citie of GAULE on ITALIE side) there was an image of his in brasse, verie like vnto him; the which Caesar afterwarde passing that way, behelde verie aduisedly, for that it was made by an excellent workeman, and was verie like him, and so went his way. Then he stayed sodainly a gaine, and called for the Gouernors of the citie, and before them all tolde them, that the citi- Bzens were his enemies, and traitors vnto him, because they kept an enemy of his among them. The Gouernors of the citie at the first were astonied at it, and stowtly denied it: and none of them knowing what enemy he ment, one of them looked on another. Octavius Caesar then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his browes, sayd vnto them: this man you see standing vp here, is he not our enemy? Then the Gouernors of the citie were worie, and frayed then before, & could not tel what answer to make him. But Caesar laughing, and commending the GAULES for their faithfulness to their frendes, euen in their aduersities, he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

THE LIFE OF Aratus.

Crissippus the Philosopher (my frend Polycrates) being affrayed as it seemeth of the euill sound of an auncient prouerbe not rightlie as it was spoken, and in vse, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

*VVhat children do their auncetors commend,
But those vvhom fortune fauors to the end?*

But Diomysius TROBZENIAN reproving him, doth rehearse the prouerbe rightlie as in deede it is?

VVhat children do their auncetors commend,

But those whose life is virtuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerbe stoppeth their mouthes who of them selues are vnworthie of praise, and yet are still boasting of the vertues of their auncesters, whose praise they hiey extoll. But affore those that (as Pindarus sayth.)

Do match their noble auncestors in proweesse of their owne,

And by their fruites commend the stocke vnto whence they them selues are growne.

(As thy selfe that conformest thy life vnto the examples and maners of thy virtuous auncesters:) it is no small good happe for them, often to remember the noble deedes of their parentes in hearing them spoken of, or otherwise for them selues oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parentes. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praise and glorie: but in ioyning their owne vertues, to the vertues of their auncesters, they do increaseth their glorie, as inheriting their virtuous life, as challenging their discent by blood. Therefore, hauing wrytten the life of Aratus thy contie man, and one of thy auncesters, whose glorie and greatnesse thou dost not blemish, I doe sende it vnto thee, not that I thinke but that thou hast more diligentlie then any man else, searched out all his deedes and sayings: But yet, because that thy two sonnes, Polycrates, and Pythocles, reading, and still hearing some thing reported, might be brought vp at home by the example of their auncesters, whose deedes shall lye before them to followe. For he loueth him selfe more, then he regardeth perfit vertue, or his credit: that thinketh him selfe so perfit, as he neede not follow any others example.

The common weale of the Sicyonians concerned in no tyrannie.

The citie of SICYONE, after it fell from her first gouernment of the optimacie and nobilitie, which is proper to the cities of the DORIANS: like an instrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and feditious practises, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceased to be plagued with those troubles and miseries, alway chaunging new tyrannes, vntill that Cleom being blaine, they chose Timoclidus and Clinias their Gouernors, two of the noblest men & of greatest authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common weale beganne to grow to a certeine state of gouernment, Timoclidus dyed: and Abantidas, the sonne of Pasalus, pretending to make him selfe Lord of the citie, he slue Clinias, and put to death some of his parentes and frendes, draue away others, and fought also to put his sonne Aratus to death, that was then but seuen yeare old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandering vp and downe the citie, being scared and affrayed, finding no man to helpe him: by good fortune he gotte into a womans house, called Sofo, which was Abantidas sister, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble minde, and iudging that the childe Aratus by Gods providence fledde vnto her: hidde him in her house, and in the night secretlie sent him vnto the citie of Argos. Now after that Aratus had escaped, and was safe from this daunger: from that time there bred in him a vehemēt malice against tyrannes, the which still increased in him, as he grew in yeares. So he was vertuouslie brought vp in the citie of Argos, with his fathers frends: and perceiuing with him selfe that he waxed bigge and strong, he disposed his bodie to diuers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in fure manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face, full and well liking, as one that fedd well, and the maiestie of his countenance argueth that he vsed fuch exercise: and fuche commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not geue him selfe so much to pleading, as peraduenture was requisite for a Gouernor of a common wealth. Howebeit, some doe iudge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquent tongue then seemed vnto some: because he wrote them in hast, hauing other busines in hand, and euen as things came first into his minde. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logitian, slue Abantidas, who did commonlie vse to sit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and oportunitie to worke their feate they did. After Abantidas death, his father Pasalus possessed the tyrannie: whom Nicoles afterwards slue also by treason, and made him selfe tyrann in his place. It is reported that this Nicoles did liuelie resemble the countenance of Periander, the sonne of Cypselus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alcmaon, the sonne of Amphiaraus: and an other young

A LACEDÆMONIAN, vnto Hector of TROYA, whom Myrsilus wryteth, was troden vnder mens feete, through the ouergreat presse of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicoles was tyrann foure monethes together, in the which he did wonderful great hurt to the citie, and had almost lost it, the ÆTOLIANS comming on a sodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Nowe Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatlie esteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they founde in him, which was no small matter: and besides that, he had a maiestie in his countenance, being wiser then was looked for in a young man of his yeares. Therefore the banished men from the citie of SICYONE, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicoles for his parte also was not carelesse of his doings, but had an eye euer to see what Aratus intended, although

B he little mistrusted any fuche bolde enterprife, nor so daungerous an exploit of him: but did onely coniecture that he did stirre vp the kings which had bene his dead fathers frendes. And so in deede Aratus tooke that course. But when he saw that Antigonus still delayed his promises, and did alwayes tract time, and that the hope of aide from king Ptolomy of ÆGYPT was too farre of: at length he determined to vndertake to destroy the tyrann him selfe. So he first consulted with Aristomachus and Ecdelus: of the which the one was banished from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, a Philosopher, and a valliant man of his hands, and had bene scholler to Arcesilauus the Academicke, in the citie of ATHENS. These two men being contented to ioyne with Aratus, he practised with other of the banished men also: of the which there were some that were ashamed, not to be partakers

C of his hope & noble attempt, and so did also ioyne with him. Howbeit the most part of them did not only refuse to enter into that practise, but further, went about to dissuade Aratus from his enterprife, saying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he vnderstoode not the daunger in vndertaking fuch a matter, altogether so vnlikelie. Nowe, as Aratus was thinking in his minde to keepe a certaine place in the territory of SICYONE, from whence they might make warre with the tyrannes: there came a prisoner vnto them out of the citie of Argos, that had broken prifon from the tyrann of SICYONE: and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the banished men. He being brought by the same Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he had saued him selfe, the grounde within was almost as high as the toppe of the wall, the which in that parte ioynd vnto high stonie places: and that without the wall the

D height was not so great, but that it was easelie scalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he sent two of his men, Seuthas, and Technon, with Xenocles to viewe the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue secretlie to execute his pretended enterprife, and quickly to put it to a venter: then to beginne a long warre, and to prepare an open arme, he being a priuate man, to goe against the power of a tyrann. Xenocles being returned againe to Aratus, after he had measured the height of the wall: he reported that the place was not vnscalable, but yet very hard to come to it vndiscovered, because of certeine liue curst cures a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leaue barking. Howebeit Aratus would not leaue of his enterprife so. Now it was not straunge to see euerie man prepare them selues of armor and weapon, because at that time there were great robberies and cruell murders committed

E by high wayes, and one would assault an other: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not sticke to make them openlie, because his common occupation did take away all suspicion why they were made. For this carpenter was him selfe also a banished man from SICYONE, as the residue were. Furthermore, Aratus frendes he had in Argos, of those fewe men they had, did euerie man of them lende him tenne men, and armed thirtie of his owne men: beside them, Aratus him selfe also did hyre some pretie number of fouldiers, by the practise of Xenophilus, whome the Captaines of the theues did furnish him. They were geuen to vnderstand that they should be ledde to the territorie of SICYONE, to take a pray of cattell and coltes of the king: and they were sent before, some one way, some another, with commandement, all to meete together at the tower of Poly- bicaufe they had no other deuife to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were A certaine fpialls of Nicoles the tyranne difcouered, that walked vp and downe the citie (making no countenance of any matter) to fee what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his houle early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the market place with his frendes. Then he went to the thewe place (or place of exercifes) and there stripped him felfe, annoynted him, and wrestled, and in the ende tooke certaine of the young gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merie, and to paffe the time away with him: and im-mediatly after, one of his feruautes was feene in the market place, carying of garlandes of flowers. An other was feene alfo buying of linckes and torches, and an other hyering of thefe common dauncing and finging women, which followe feaftes and bankets with their instruments. Nicoles fpialls feeing that, were deceiued: for one of them laughing on an other fayd, B that they might eafely fee by that, there was nothing more fearefull and timerous then a ty-ran: considering that Nicoles being Lord of fo great a citie, was affrayed of a young ftrippling, that fpent all that he could rappe & tend to keepe him in his banifhment, vpon vaine bankets, and feaftes, at noone dayes. And thus were the tyrans fpialls finely mocked. Aratus felfe departed immediatly after dinner out of Argos, & went vnto his fouldiers, whom he had appointed before to mete him at the tower of Polygnorus, & led them ftraight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent and purpofe, hauing before made an Oration vnto them to encourage them, and alfo made them maruelous fayer promifes. Then he gaue them for their watche word, Apollo fauorable, and fo went directly to the citie of Sicyone, marching with great fpeede at the firft bicaufe of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwarde slackened C his pace a litle, fo that they had Moone light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardeners houle that was harde by the wall. So Caphefias, whome he had fent before vnto the gardeners houle, came to meete with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, bicaufe they ranne away: howbeit that he had made falt the gardiner in his owne houle. This difcraged the moft parte of all the companie, who would needes haue him in any cafero returne backe againe. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promifed that he would lead them backe againe, if it chanced that the dogges were too bufie with them: and therewithall prefently caufed the ladder men to goe before, whom Ecdelus and Mnafithens led, and he him felfe came fayer and fofterly after.

The dogges made a fowle barking, and were baying about Ecdelus & his companie. This notwithftanding, they came fafely to the wall, and did let vp their fcaling ladders. But euen as the firft men got vp on them, the Captaine of the watch that had geuen place to him that fould ward in the morning, came by chauce, and paffed hard by them, vifiting the fouldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noyfe of men that followed him.
They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and ftirred not: and thereby the fouldiers that paffed by them, could not fee them. But now the new morning watch came towards them alfo, which did put them in great danger to be difcouered: but yet they once againe fcaped them and were not difcouered, bicaufe the fecond watch went beyond them, and ftayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnafithens immediatly fcaled the wall, & fent Techmon with all poffible fpede vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the haft he could to come to them. Now there was no great diftance betwixt the garden where the dogges were, and the wall, and a litle tower where they kept a great greyhounde to keepe watche: but the greyhounde neuer heard their comming, either bicaufe he was a cowardly curie of nature, or els for that he had bene ouercourfed and wearied the day before. But the gardeners litle curies that bald and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhounde with their barking, who at the firft began to aunfwere them with a foft ginning: but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out alowe, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Infomuch, that the skowt which was further of, called alowe to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made fuch a barking, and whether there were any thing fturring or not that angered him. The hunt within the tower aunfwered, that it was nothing, but that his dogge was waked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that paffed by, and at the noyfe of the bell. This made Aratus fouldiers a great deale the bolder: bicaufe they thought that the hunte had bene made

A priuy to their enterprife, and that he went about to hide their fecret attempt, and hoped alfo that there were many other within the citie that would further their enterprife. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height, and very dangerous, bicaufe the ladders (hooked, and bowed by reafon of the waight of the men, vnles they did come vp fayer and fofterly one after another. Furthermore the time did put them in fome perill, bicaufe the cocks began to crowe, and the contry folke that brought things to the market to fell, began to come a pace to the towne out of euery quarter. And therefore Aratus made hafte to get vp, hauing onely forty men aboute with him, and looked for fome befides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly towards the tyrannes pallace, where his hiered fouldiers kept watch and ward: and comming fodenly vpon them, layed hold of euery man of them, & B blue not one. Then he fent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. There-vpon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to breake, and ftraight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, bicaufe of the noyfe and fturre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter was: vntill at length an Herald proclay-med with open voyce, that it was Aratus the fonne of Clinias, who called his contry men and Citizens to the recouerye of their libertie. Then they perfuading them felues, that the thing which they long wifhed and looked for, was now come to paffe: they ranne all in a trowpe together to the tyrannes houle, and fet it a fire. But the flame rofe fo high and great after the fire had taken it in euery part, that it was feene to the citie of Corinthe: infomuch that the C Corinthians fwondering what the matter fhould be, were in mind to haue gone to helpe it.
Now for Nicoles, he faued him felfe, and got out of the citie by fecret vaults he had made vnder the ground. The fouldiers on the other fide quenching the fire with the helpe of the Citizens, did facke all they found in the tyrants pallace. The which Aratus hyndered not, but did moreouer make all the reft of the tyrants goods common amongst them. So his enterprife had fo good fuccesse, that there was none of his owne companie flayne he brought with him; nether any of their enemies that were within the citie, fortune kept this exploit fo pure and cleane from any bloudshed. Then Aratus reftored foure fcore men vnto their lands & goods againe, whome the tyrant Nicoles had banifhed: and others alfo, that had bene banifhed by former tyrants, to the number of fife hundred men, who had bene wel neare fifty yeares fpace banifhed out of their contry. Nowe the moft of them being come home poore and needy, D would haue entred on their goods and lands they enioyed before: and fo, entring againe vpon their lands in their contry, and their houfes in the citie, they amazed Aratus withall, feeing Antigonus on the one fide praftife all the meanes he could to winne Sicyone beeing nowe free, and they all in an vpror and mutinie in the citie. Therefore, following the beft counfell he could thinke vpon and deuife, considering the daunger of the prefent tyme: he ftoyned the citie in league and friendship with the Achaians, and of them all, made but one bodye.
And bicaufe the Citizens of Sicyone were Dorians, they were glad to fubmit them felues to be gouerned and protected by the name of the Achaians, who were at that tyme of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in litle villages, and had no great boundes of landes, nether were they very fpecial good, for that they ftoode vpon the fea fide, where was no manner of haue nor port, but ftones and rockes good ftoze: and the fea bearing vpon them, did cafte E into the mayne land. This notwithstanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of Greece when it was vnited and gouerned by good policie was of greater force, and almoft invincible. For the Achaians being in comparifon of the auncient force of Greece, of no regard, and but a part of one citie enfeebled with ciuill and forrein warre: So long as they could fubmit them felues to be ruled by the wifedome and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy & malice his proferitie and fouerainty: they did not onely mainteyne them felues as free men in the middest of the feruitude of fo many great cities, large and mighty, but did alfo deliuer many other people of Greece from their tyrants. Now, for Aratus manners: he was one that in nature loued ciuill gouernment, and equalitie among Citizens in one felfe citie: he was nobly minded, and more painefull about the affayres of the common weale, then careful of his owne bufines, and hated tyrants to the death, and employed his good or euill will wholly for the feruice of the common wealth. And therefore he feemed not to be fo fownd a friend, as he was a gentle and mercifull enemye: framing him selfe in either of both, as tyme serued A for the common wealth. To be short, it was a generall and common voyce amonge all the cities confederates, in priuate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honestly. That in open warres he was not so valliant and coragious, as he was crafty and furtell, to take a citie on the sodaine. Furthermore, though he was valliant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would neuer haue brought to passe: yet it seemeth he left many thinges possible vndone, the which he might easily haue done, for that he durst not ventur on them. For as there be beastes whose sight is perfitte by night, and by day they can see nothing, bicause the subtiltie of the humor and moysture in their eyes is dried vp, and can not abide the bright light of the daye: euen fo, men that otherwise by nature are very wise, are easely affrayd of daunger, when they must ventur on it at B noone dayes, where contrarily they are bold in secret enterprises, sodeinly to attēpt any thing. Now, this contrarietie and difference in men well brought vp, groweth through ignorance & lacke of instruction of Philosophie, which of it selfe doth norith vertue, as frute that springeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is best discerned by examples. So Aratus hauing ioyned him selfe and his citie SICYONE vnto the ACHAIANS, and seruing in person as a man of armes among the rest: he was maruelously beloued of his generalls, that saw him so obedient. For, notwithstanding that he had made so large a contribution as the estimation of him selfe, and the force of his citie vnto the common wealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was ready to obey and execute the commandements of the generalls, as the poorest and meanest souldier, were he of DYMA, or of TRITA, or of any other small village whatsoeuer. Furthermore, a great summe of money beeing sent him from king Proton for a gifte, amownting to twenty and fise talente, he tooke it, but forthwith disposed it amongest his poore contry men, both to releue their want, as also to redeeme prisoners. This notwithstanding, the banished men still vexed & troubled them that had their goods & lands, to haue the out of their hands, and otherwise would be satisfied by no meanes. Their common wealth therefore beeing in great daunger to fall into ciuill warre, Aratus perceiving there was no other way to helpe this mischance, but by Proton's liberalitie: he determined to goe vnto him, to praye him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he embarked at the hauen of MATRONA, about the foreland of MALEA, to sayle from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had such a contrary wind, and the sea rose so hie, that the maister of the shippe was driuen to let her goe D whether she woulde to take sea roome. So beeing driuen quite from his direct course, with great daunger he got to the citie of ADRIA, which was his enemy: bicause Antigon kept it, and had a garrison in it. But Aratus did wisely preuent it, going a shore, & wandred farr from the sea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wodde, where they had an euill nights rest. He had not gone farr after he had left his shippe, but the Captaine of the garrison came, and sought for him. Notwithstanding, his seruants had mocked him finely, (beeing before instructed by Aratus what answer they should make) saying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EUBOIA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garrison stayed the shippe, his men, and all things els he had in her, and tooke her for a good prise. Within fewe dayes after, Aratus being maruelously troubled, and at a straight with him selfe what he should doe: there E happily arrived a ROMANE shippe hard by the place where he kept most, partly to hide him selfe, and partly also to see if he could discouer any thing. This shippe was bound for SYRIA. So he had delt with the maister of the shippe in that sorte, that he tooke him aboard, and promised he would deliuer him in CARIA, and so he did. But he was in as much daunger, this second iorney againe by sea, as he was in the first he made towards ÆGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into ÆGYPT, and spake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus sed him still by sending of him passing fayer tables, and pictures of GRECE, of excellent workmanship. And in deede hauing a singuler good wit, he alwayes got together, and bought the excellentest painted pictures he could get, but specially the pictures of Pamphibius and Melanthis, to send them vnto the king. For learning florished yet in the citie of SICYONE, and they esteemed the paintings of tables in that citie, to be the perfittest for true cul- F ture, and fine drawing of all other places. Inomuch as Apelles, (though he was then of marue-

And therefore when Aratus had restored his citie againe to liber- tie, he caused all the images of the tyrannes to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit he stooode doubtful a long tyme, whether he should deface Arifratrus picture or not, who raigned in the tyme of Phillip. For it was paynted with the hands of all the schollers of Melanthis, be- ing by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victorie, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a passing peece of worke to see to, so that Aratus at the first yielded, and was contented to saue it for the excellencye of the workmanship: yet in the ende, ouercome with the extreme hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it should be defaced. Now it is reported also, that Neales the paynter being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon such a notable peece of worke. But when he saw Aratus so hard harted that he would not graunt it: he tolde him it was good reason to make warre with ty- rants, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (y he) leaue the chariot of triumphe and victo- rie, and I will make thee see Arifratrus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was conten- ted to let him haue his will. Then Neales defaced the picture of Arifratrus, and in place there- of drue onely a palme tree, and durst adde nothing els to it of his owne deuise. Some say, that vnder the chariot were conueied Arifratrus feete defaced. So Aratus by meanes of these tables and pictures, was maruelously well beloued of king Proton. But after that he was acquaynted with him, and knew his conseruation: he loued him then better then before. Inomuch that C he gaue him a hundred and fifty talente to helpe his citie withall: of the which, he caried for- ty away with him vnto PELOPONNESVS, and the king afterwards sent him the rest at sundry tymes. Nowe this was a maruelous matter of him to get such a masse of money together for his Citizens: considering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouvernors of free cities, for a litle summe of money onely which they haue taken of kings and Princes, haue bene corrupted, & betrayed their townes and contry. But this was a more wonder, that by meanes of this money, he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and riche, and furthermore, saued vpright all the people of SICYONE, where he shewed him selfe maruelous wise, and temperate, being of that great power and authoritie he was. For after they had chosen him Arbitrator to iudge, com- pound, and absolutely to decyde all quarrells and strife betwene the banished men: he would D neuer vndertake it him selfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefeest Citizens with him, and with them, with great paynes and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his ci- tizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore, not onely all the inhabi- tants and Citizens of SICYONE together, did not onely decree publike honors meete for him: but also the banished men them selues did priuately cast his image in brasse, and set it vp, vnder the which they caused this inscription to be grauen.

Thy prouesse and thy feates of armes, thy counsell sage and wife, Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skyes, But also to the utmost freys of Maarok blouven by fame,
And vnto that through thy goodnes home into our contry came, Haue set this image up to thee Aratus, as a signe Of our deliurance through thy lone and through the pouer diuine.
For thy good nature furthred by good fortune doth restore Vs contry, lawes, and libertie, bereft vs quite before.

Aratus hauing done all these thinges, he suppressed the enuye of the Citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigon being angry with Aratus in his mind, and seeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Proton: he did him many other great curtesies, Aratus neuer seeking them at his hands. But one day specially about the rest, as he did sacrifice vnto the gods at CORINTH, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had sacrificed, vnto SICYONE. And at the feast of his sacrifice in the hea- F ring of many noble men that were bidden guests, he sayd openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this young SICYONIAN could not but haue a liberal mind, louing the libertie of his contry and contry men: but I perceiue now he is a man that can iudge of Princes manners and affayres. For heretofore he made no accompt of vs, bicause his hope was out of this contry, A and he greatly esteemed the riches of ÆGYPT, hearing talke of so many Elephants, of such a great fleet of shippes, and of such a sumptuous Court, as king Ptolomyes Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a smoke and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: & for my part, he is welcome to me, & I will haue you all to take him for my friend. These words of king Antigonus, were straight taken at bownd of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man struing who should write all the euil they could against him: So that Ptolomy thereupon sent a Messenger of purpose vnto him, to reprove him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betwene the earnest loue of these Princes and kings, that contended with eche other who should haue Aratus. Furthermore, the first tyme that Aratus was chosen Lieutenant general of the trybe of the ACHAÏANS, he forraged B and spoyled the contry of LOCRIE, which lyeth directly ouer against ACHAÏA, and CALYDONIA also. Howbeit he came not tyme enough to ayde the BEOOTIANS, in the battell which they lost before the citie of CHERONEA, against the ÆTOLIANS: where Abacritus, Governor of BOROIA was slayne in the field, with a thousand other BEOOTIANS. Howbeit the next year following, he being the second tyme chosen Lieutenant general, he attempted to win the castell of CORINTH againe, being an enterprise which not onely concerned the priuate benefit of SICYONE it selfe, and the trybe of the ACHAÏANS, but also of all GRECE besides. For, he was fully bent to driue the garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed euen a very keepe that held all the GRECIANS noses to the gryndstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, hauing in a certaine conflict discomited the kings Lieutenants, C wrote to the ATHENIANS that he had wonne a victory halfe sister to the victory of Marathon: Euen so he thinks it were no disgrace to say, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrants, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thrasibulus ATHENIAN, sauing that this last acte was more famous, bicause it was not against GRECIANS, but against straungers, and forreyn power and gouernment, vpon whom it was executed. For the Isthmus or barre of PELOPONNESVS, which seperatech the sea Ægeum from the sea Ionium, doth come and ioyne the firme land of the rest of GRECE, with the PRESCHES, an Iland of PELOPONNESVS. Euen so likewise, the Mountaine called Acrocorinthe, on the which the castell standeth, rising vp in the middle of GRECE, when there is any garrison of men of warre in it, it cutteth off all traffike and passage by, of any armies of them which inhabit within the straite: from them that are without the straight, both by sea and by land, and maketh him onely Lorde of the contry that keepeth the castell. So that it was not for sport, but for truth, and in good earnest, that Philip the young king of MACEDON was wont to call the citie and castell of CORINTH, the stocks and gyues of GRECE. And therefore was this castell maruclously wished and desired of euery man, but specially of kings and Princes. But the desire Antigonus had of it was so vehement, that it differed nothing from the passions of a frantick louer. For he did nothing els continually but study and deuise howe he might winne it vpon the fodefine, from them that kept it: bicause otherwise by open force, it was impossible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that castell, being poysoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practise, the castell being left in the hands of his wife Nicea, who gouerned the state of CORINTH, and did carefully cause the Acrocorinthe to be kept: he immediately sent his sonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicea in good hope to marry her with this young Prince: a thing that pleased this Lady well, though she was very olde. So, for her selfe, she was wonne straight, by meanes of his young sonne Demetrius, whome he vied as a flate to intrappper. Howbeit Nicea for all this goodly offer, forsooke nor her castell, but alwayes made it straightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus seemed to make no accompt of it, but dayly gaue him selfe to make sumptuous sacrifices, feasts, and playes to the gods, within the citie of CORINTH for the marriage: as though he had ment no other thing, but banqueting and iollitie all that might be. When the howe was come to see these sportes, and that the Mufition Amabeus began to singe: he him selfe made as though he would accompany Nicea vnto the Theater, being conueyed thither in a sumptuous riche lytter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honor, and thought nothing lesse then of that which happened her. But when

A when Antigonus came to the ende of a streete that turned to goe vp the hill towards the castell, he had her keepe on till to the Theater: and him selfe in the meane time left Amabeus there with his singing, and all the feast of the marriage, and went straight vp to the castell, forcing him selfe aboue his strength and yeares. When he was at the toppe of the hill, and found the gates shut, he knocked with his staffe, and commanded the garrison to open him the gates. They wondering to see him there in person, did let him in. When he was gotten into the castell, he was so exceeding ioyfull of it, that he had no reason to moderate his ioye, but would banquet in the middle of streetes, and in the market place, hauing minstrells to playe vpon their instruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for ioye, and did so fondly and lightly behaue him selfe, as if he had bene a light young man, and not (as he was) an olde man: who had proued such sundry chaunges of fortune, and yet suffered him selfe to be thus caried away with pleasure, that he embraced, and spake to euery man he met. Whereby it is easie to iudge, that ioy possesting a man without wit or discretion, it maketh him besides him selfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then payne or feare. Now Antigonus hauing wonne the castell of the Acrocorinthe, as you haue heard, he put it into the hands of those he trusted best, to be safely kept: and therefore made Perseus the Philosophers Captaine of the castell. But in deepe Aratus was in mind to haue attempted the taking of the castell, in Diocles his life tyme: yet he let it alone, bicause he ioynd him selfe with the ACHAÏANS. But at that tyme there was offered him another occasion againe to attempt it, and that it was at CORINTH, there were foure brethren borne in SYRIA, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a souldier of the garrison of the castell: and the rest, hauing robbed the kings treasure, went straight vnto SICYONE, to Aegias the banker, whome Aratus employed in his cultie. These three brethren immediately told him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them called Erginus, comming often to see him, by litle and litle told him all the rest. By this meanes Aegias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garrison of the castell of the Acrocorinthe. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp those steepe and high rocks, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocks, that went to a place of the wall of the castell, which was very lowe. Aegias hearing that, answered him smiling: alas, my friend, what meane you to steale a litle peece of golde to hinder the king when in one howers space you can sell such a great masse of money together? for as well shall you dye if you be apprehended for this felony, as if you were otherwise attainted for treason. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promised that he would feele his brother Diocles in it, for he did not greatly trust his other brethren. So returning shortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fiftene foote high, promising that he would helpe him to execute the rest, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promised then to giue him fifty talents, if he brought his enterprise to passe: and if he fayled, that he would then giue either of them a house and a talent. Erginus would haue the whole so, and put into Aegias the bankers handes. Aratus had not so much ready money, and besides, he would not take it vp at very, for feare of giuing cause to suspect his enterprise. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and siluer, and his wifes jewells, and layed them to gage to Aegias, to disburse the sayd summe. But Aratus had so great and noble a mind in him, and was so bent to doe notable acts: that knowing howe Phocion and Epanimondus had bene esteemed for the iustest and honestest men of GRECE, bicause they had refused great giftes that were offered them, and would neuer sell nor stayne their honor for money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his owne, to bring any good enterprise to passe, & did put his life in danger for the common benefit of his contry men, they them selues knowing nothing of his enterprise, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and corage of such a man, and that will not euen now as it were, be willing to ayde him: considering how dearly he bought so great a danger of his person, and howe he laied his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middlest of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of such a noble enterprise, and nothing els? But now, though the enterprise of it selfe was dangerous, an error chauncing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more daungerous. For Aratus had sent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to viewe the wall. A This Technon had neuer spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his minde what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled heare, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Nowe Technon being come to the place where Erginus sayd he would be with Diocles: he stayed before the towne in a place called QANTIS. So whilest he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles, called Diomyfius (who knew nothing of the enterprife, nor was made acquainted withall, and looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moued by the markes he sawe in him, like vnto thole he was told of: asked him if he were nothing a kinner to Erginus. The other answered, he was his brother. Then Technon perswading him selfe it was certainly Diocles, that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other inquiry of him: he tooke him by the hand, and began to talke with him of the practise he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Diomyfius taking the matter vpon him, and feeding on his error, returned forth with into the cite, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But euen as Diomyfius was ready to take him fast by the choller: his brother Erginus came. Who, perceiving how Technon had mistaken the matter, and the danger he was in: beoknot to him with his head to flye, and so they both ranne for life vnto Aratus, to saue them selues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but sent Erginus straight to cary his brother Diomyfius money, and to praye him not to be knowen of any thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him suer for starting: for they bound him, and locked him vp fast in a chamber, whilest they went about their enterprife. So when all things were ready, Aratus commaunded the rest of his army that they should tary behind, armed all night: and he him selfe, with foure hundred of the best men he had, (not knowing them selues whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the gates of the cite, passing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middelt of summer, when the Moone was at the full, and the element very cleere without cloudes: infomuch that they were afraid their armors should glister by Moone light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came neare vnto the cite, there rose cloudes out of the sea that darkened all the cite & places thereabouts, and shadowed them. Then all of them sitting downe on the ground, plucked off their shoes, both bicause they should make lesse noyse, as also for that their footing should be sicer, and that they should slippe lesse vpon the ladders. But Erginus, and seven other companions with him like men that trauell, came secretly into the gate of the cite, and slue the porter, and warders there. At that very instant, Aratus caused the ladders to be set vp against the walls, and made a hundred of his souldiers get vp on them: and sent also to commaund the rest, that they should follow him with all possible speede. Then drawing vp his ladders after him, as fast as he could, he went through the cite with his hundred men toward the castell, with such a ioyfull cheere, as if he had had it already in his hand, for that he saw he was not discouered. But as he went on, he saw foure of the watch comming with a light against them. They saw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies saw them plainly a farr off. Aratus & his men therefore stoode vp close against old walls to tary their comming, and at the first onset, slue three of them: but the fourth hauing a blowe on his head with a sword, ranne away. E making an outcry, that the enemies were in the cite. The trompsers forthwith sowned the alarm, all the cite was in an vporre, the streetes were straight full of people ronning vp and downe, and of lights in euery corner, both beneath in the cite, as also in the castell, and the noyse was great euery where. Aratus in the meane tyme forced to get vp the hie rocks fayer & softly at the first, and with great payne and difficultie, being out of his pashe he should haue found, which he missed, being very deepe into the rocks, and with many crookes and cranks went to the foote of the castell: but sodainely, euen as it had bene by miracle, the Moone appearing through the cloudes, when they were in their worst way, it gaue the light, & brought them to that part of the wall where they should be, and straight the Moone was shadowed againe. Now the three hundred souldiers whome Aratus had left at the gate by the temple of Iuno, when they were come into the cite, being full of lights, and in vporre, and besides could not find the path by the, which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they stoode close together gether vnder a rocke that shadowed them, sorrowfully looking to heare some newes of Aratus who was then fighting with the garrison of the castell, the which made head against him with all the force and power they could. Vnder the castell there was a great noyse heard of men that fought, but yet the noyse was so confused by the found rebounding against the rocks and mountaine, that they could not deuise whence it should come. So they being in this perplexitie, not knowing which way to turne them selues: Archelaus, Captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of souldiers with him, went vp the hill with great cries and noyse of trumpets, to ser vpon Aratus, and his company behind. But after he was passed by these three hundred souldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they had bene layed there in ambuscade of purpose, and slue the first they encountered withall, and made the others B so affrayde, and Archelaus him selfe, that they disperfed them, and made some flye one way, some another waye. So, as they were ouerthrowen, Erginus came to these three hundred men, comming immediately from them that fought, and brought them newes that Aratus and them of the castell, were come to the sword together, and valliantly descended them selues, lustily fighting for the wall, and therefore it was tyme for them to helpe him quickly. Then the souldiers bad him bringe them thither straight, and so he did. So they clymng vp the hill, did signifie by their cries to their men, that they came to ayde him. Furthermore, the Moone being then at the full, and shining on their harness, made their enemies in the castell thinke that they were a greater number then in deede they were, bicause of the longe waye they had to make to gette vppon the rocks: and also bicause of the found in the night, that made their crye seeme to be of a greater number then they were. At length they ioyning with Aratus, they fought it out so lustily, that they draue the garrison out of the walls, and by breake of daye wanne the castell. So that their exploit was discouered by the rising of the Sunne, and besides, all the rest of their army that came from the cite of SICYONE: whome the CORINTHIANS very gladly receyued, and did set open their gates vnto them, and ayded them to take king Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was safe, then Aratus came from the castell vnto the Theater of the cite, whither repayed an infinite number of people, as well for the desire they had to see him, as also to hear him speake vnto the CORINTHIANS. So hauing placed the ACHAIANS of either side, at the comming into the Theater: Aratus being armed, went vp into the chayer or pulpit for D orations, hauing his face quite chaunged, both for the great paynes he had taken, and also for lacke of sleepe: so that his body being ouerwearied, his spirits were euen downe. Now when all the assembly of the people (seeing him in the chayer) did humble them selues to shewe him all the honor and kindnes they could possible: he tooke his speare out of his left hand, and his right, and bowing his knee and body somewhat, he leaned vpon it, and so stoode a great while in this manner before he spake, receiuing the cries of ioy and clapping of hands which the people made, praying his valliantnes, and blessing his good happe and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, mere for the enterprife from whence he came: and perswaded them to ioyne to the ACHAIANS. So E therewithall, they presently deliuered him the keyes of their cite, the which were neuer before that tyme in their power, since the raigne of king Philip. Nowe touching the other Captaines of king Antigonus: Aratus hauing taken Archelaus prisoner, he let him goe, but put Theophrastus to death, bicause he would not goe out of CORINTHE. Persamus (Captaine of the castell) seeing the castell but lost: he secretly faued him selfe, & fled vnto the cite of CENCHREAE. And it is reported, that as he was afterwards in talke of Philosophie, where one mainteining that a man could not be a good Captaine, vnles he were a perfite wife man: This (g) he is one of *Zeno*s opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleased me best: but now this young SICYONIAN Aratus, hath made me of an other mind. Many writers doe report this saying of Persamus. Furthermore Aratus wanne presently the temple of Iuno, and the haufen of LECHAEVM, where he tooke fise and twenty shippes of king Antigonus, and fise hundred horse of service for the warre, and foure hundred SYRIANS, which he sold euery one of them. dogges, and as many hunts, all the which were kept for the watch of the castell. Now, the Ro-MANES wondring at the valliantnes of Philopemen: they called him the last of the GRECIANS.

Euen so might I also (in my opinion) say, that this acte is the last and most famous of all the GRECIANS, and deserueth to be equal, as well for valliantnes, as also good successe, with the greatest employes of the most famous auncients: as that which followed immediately after doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS reuolting from king Antigonus, did straight ioyne with Aratus: and the TROBENTIANES also with the EPIDAVRIANS, did likewise enter into league and friendship with the ACHAIANS. So at the first inuasion he made, he went to spoyle the contry of ATTICA, and crossed ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA, and spoyled and destroyed it, euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of prison, to serue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he lent home the ATHENIAN PRISON-ERS without paying of ransom: and all of policie to make them desirous to rebell against the MACEDONIANS. Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederat of the ACHAI-ANS, with condition, that he should be Lieutenant generall both by sea & by lande. For these respects Aratus was of maruelous estimation and credit with the ACHAIANS: insomuch that where they could not yearly choose him their general, being contrary to their law: they chose him at the least every second year, but in effect, all was done by his aduise and counsell. For they saw plainly, that it was nether honor, nor riches, nor friendship of kings & Princes, nor the priuate benefit of his owne citie wherein he was borne, nor any other thing els that he preferred, before the glory & increase of the common wealth of the ACHAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities by the selues were but weake, & being ioyned together with the chaine of common benefit, they were a strength one to preferue the other. And in like manner, euen as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beasts haue life & sustenance, being ioyned & knit together, & straight so soone as there is any seperation of them thone from thother, they lue no more & putrifie: euen so cities also were brought to decay by them that did disperse their societie among them, & in contrary manner did then againe increase, when ioyning with any other great body & city, they were gouerned with wisdom & good counsell. So Aratus seing the chiefest cities thereof enioy their lawes and liberties: thought it a shamefull thing to leauie the ARGIVES in slavery & bondage. Wherefore he practised to kil the tyrant Aristomachus that gouerned them, both to shew him selfe thankfull to the citie for his bringing vppe there: as also to ioyne that great & mighty citie vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Now these were diuers men that had the harts and corage to doe it, of the which the chiefest were Aeschylus, and Charimenes the Soothsayer, but they had no swordes: for they were straightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grievous punishments ordeyned for them that should be found with any swordes. Aratus therefore caused certain litle short daggers to be made at CORINTH for them, the which he sowed vp in packes caried on certen beasts laden with other baggage and stuffe. But the Soothsayer Charimenes, did impart this enterpryse vnto a third man, and made him one of the conspiracie with them. Aeschylus being very much offended with it, beganne therefore to enter into practise by him selfe, and left their company. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke such a toye in his head in a mad moode, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their enterpryse. This notwithstanding, the most parte of the conspirators faued them selues, and fled to CORINTH. So the tyrant Aristomachus was slaine shortly after, by his owne men. But then another tyrant, Aristippus, a crueller man than the first, made haste to take the tyranny before he could be resisted. This notwithstanding, Aratus, with all the young men of the ACHAIANS able to serue in the field, went sodaynly thither with ayde, hoping to find them of the citie very glad to recouer their libertie. Howbeit the people being acquainted, and of long time vied patiently to beare the yoke of bondage: there was not a man of them that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe, and did nothing, sauing that thereby the ACHAIANS were accused, because that in open peace they had made warre, & therefore they were put in fute before the MANTINIANES, at Aristippus request, tyrant of AR-GOS. The matter was pleaded in Aratus abience, & the ACHAIANS were condēned to pay the summe of 30. Minas. After this prooffe & atēpt of Aratus, Aristippus being afraid of Aratus, & hating him to the death, sought waies to kil him, with the help of Antigonus, who did aide him

A in it: and almost there were spalls in euery corner, that did nothing els but lye in waye to execute Aristippus minde. Now, there is no suerier garde vnto a Prince, then the perfite loue and good will of his subiects. For, after that the nobilitie and common people haue bene vsed to feare, not him, but those that for him commaund them: he then seeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares, and knoweth what is done farre of. Here therefore I will a litle di-gresse from my historie, to shewe you the manner of Aristippus life the tyrant, whereunto I was brought by this so much desired tyrannical gouernment, and smoke of signorie, so este-med of all men. Now, though Aristippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great gard of fouldiers about him for the safety of his person, and that there was not an enemy of his left aliue in all the citie: yet he made his fouldiers watche and lye without his pallace, vnder the cloisters and galleries thereof, & after supper turned all his men out of the dores, & then shut his Court gates to him, and locked him selfe alone with his Concubine, in a litle hie chamber with a trappe dore, and set his bed vpon it, & so slept, as one that continually was afraid of him selfe. Then after he was come vp, his Concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in an other chamber: and so did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this tyrannic tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a snake that should haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not hauing obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue a continuall gouernment, being simply apparelled with a poore gowne of smal price, & shewing him selfe a mortal enemy vnto all sorts of tyrants: hath left a race & noble ofspring among the GRECIANS, which remaine yet vntill this present day.

C Contrarily also, there are fewe tyrants that doe vlturpe the castles of free cities, that keepe so many fouldiers in pay, that make such prouision for armor and weapon, & haue so many gates and drawbridges for the safety of their persons, that in the ende can keepe them selues from violent death, no more then hares: nether doe leaue also any posteritie, house, or graue, why their memorie should be honored after their death. So Aratus hauing diuers waies made sundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwise sodaynly, to take the citie of ARGOS, and to thrust out the tyrant Aristippus: he euer fayled of his purpose, but specially one night among the rest, when he entred the citie very daungerously, with a fewe fouldiers with him, and slue the fouldiers that came to giue supply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the tyrant with all his forces came to set vpon him: the ARGIVES sturred not at all, as if

D Aratus had not fought for their libertie, but as though they had bene Iudges appointed to sit to see the sportes of the games Nemeæ, to iudge the game vnto the Conqueror without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the meane tyme fighting like a valliant man, was thrust at with a pyke, and ranne through the thigh. This notwithstanding, at length he wanne that part of the citie where he fought, and was not thrust out till night, what force fouer the enemies made vpon him: and if he could possibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtayned his purpose. For the tyrant looked for no other but to fflye, and had already sent diuers of his goods to the sea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any newes of it, besides also lacking water, and for that he could not helpe him selfe because of his wound, he was driuen to leade his men away, and fayled of his purpose. So, dispayring that he could euer

E take it by stealth, he went thither with open warres, and spoyled and destroyed all the contry of ARGOS: and hauing fought a great battell against the tyrant Aristippus, by the ryuer of Cha-res, they blamed Aratus much, that he forooke the victorie, and cowardly retyred out of the battell. For the rest of his army doubles had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in chafe: when he fled, being affrayd, not compelled by his enemies, but mistrusting his fortune, and retyred to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chafe of their enemies were offended, for that they hauing put them to flight, and also slayne a greater number moe of them then they had lost of theirs, and yet for cowardlines should suffer their enemies (whome they had overcome and put to flight) to sette vppe markes of triumphe in token of victorie: Aratus being ashamed of it, determined to fight once agayne, for the markes of F triumphe. Whereuppon, resting his men but one daye, he led them agayne into the field, and setting his army in battell raye, offered to fight once more. This notwithstanding, when he sawe a great supply comming to his enemye, and that the tyrants men came to fight more lustely, and with better corage then before: Aratus durst not abyde them, but rettyred, and sent to demand leaue to take away his dead men to bury them. Yet he could speake so curteously, and behaue him selfe so wisely, by the experience he had in gouernment, and also for the good will they bare him: that they forgot the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES vnto the ACHAIANS, where he caused the feastes of the games Nemeto to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEANS, then vnto the ARGIVES. This notwithstanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it also, and then was the first time that the sanctuary and priuiledge was broken, which was wont to be graunted vnto all them that came to play for the games: bicause the ACHAIANS did make them prisoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their contry, and sold them as enemies. So maruelously did Aratus and the ACHAIANS hate all sortes of tyrants, without respect of pardon. Shortly after he was aduertised, that the tyrant Aristippus did lye in wayre to spye oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affrayd of it, bicause he remayned at that tyme in CORINTHE. So Aratus straight sent out commaundement vnto euery place, to assemble the army of the trybe of the ACHAIANS, and that they should bring vittells with them for many dayes: and so craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHEES, to intise Aristippus, by his going away so farre of, that in his absence he shoulde attempt to set vpon the CLEONEANS, as in deede he did. For, he layed not presently to goe thither with his armye. But Aratus returning from CENCHEES vnto CORINTHE, very late in the night, and hauing layed good watche euery way: he sodainly brought the armye of the ACHAIANS vnto CLEONES with such speede and quietnes, that they were not leene as they came, but entred into the citie of CLEONES by night, and were ready to fight with the tyrant, before he knewe they were come. So the gates of the citie were set open by breake of daye, and the signall of battell giuen by found of trumpets: and so setting vpon the tyrants men with great cryes, they suspecting nothing, they were presently put to flight. And bicause the place where the ouerthrowe was giuen, had many turnings: Aratus following the chafe, tooke the way which he thought the tyrant fled in. The chafe continued to the citie of MYCENES. There the tyrant was ouertaken by a CRETAN called Tragifemus, (as Dinias reporteth) who slue him: and there were slayne of his men also, aboue fifteene thousand. But now Aratus hauing wonne such a famous victorie, and lost neuer a man: he could not yett winne the citie of ARGOS, nor set it againe at liberty. For one AEGIAS, and another Aristomachus, got into the towne with the kings army, and kept it. But notwithstanding, by this noble victorie Aratus did race out a great part of the reproache they gaue him, and of the scoffes and flents the flatterers of the tyrants deuised of him. VVho to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight in deede, the generall of the ACHAIANS had the winde collicke in his belly, and a dymnesse in his eyes with a guydines in his head, when he heard but the found of the trumpets. And furthermore also, when he had set his men in battell raye, and giuen them the word of battell: he asked the generalls if he should neede to be there in person, bicause he was hurt in the heele, and then would get him as farre of as he could, to see the ende of the battell. This talke was so common, that the Philosophers them selues disputing of it, to wote, whether to tremble and change colour in present danger and perill, be signes of a faint hart, or of an euill complexion and coldnes of body: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valliant Captaine, and yett when he began to fight, he was euier in that taking. So when he had ouercome Aristippus, he sought meanes also to destroy Lyfidas MEGALOPOLITAN, who as absolute Lord and king of the contry, kept the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Norwithstanding, he had no base minde in him, nether was he caried away with a cruell desire of tyrannye to lue at his pleasure, nor through extreme couetousnes, as most Princes be: but being a young man, & pricked forward with desire of honor & fame, & hauing vnaduisedly cōceiued in his mind, (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reasons he heard men talke of principality, as of a state most blessed, & worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make him selfe Lord of his contry. But afterwards, he was soone weary of the daungers & troubles such maner of gouernment bringeth with it, & desired to follow Aratus, whome he fawke prosper, and of great honor. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he tooke holde of a noble deuise: first, to rid him selfe of the malice

A phisicall question whether new king, and changing of colour, be a signe of cowardlines. Lyfidas, tyrant of Megalipolis.

A malice and feare of the prison and garde of his souldiers: and lastly, to be a benefactor to his contry. So he sent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliuered vp his citie to the trybe of the ACHAIANS. They so extolled him for this acte, that they chose him their Lieuutenant generall of all their tribe. Wherefore, Lyfidas, struing at the first to excell Aratus in honor, attempted diuers things which were not very needefull: as amongst others, to make warre with the LACEDEMONIANS. But Aratus was very much against him in that, though some thinke it was for enuy. Thereupon they chose Lyfidas generall of the ACHAIANS the second tyme: although Aratus openly both spake, and made what meanes he could to the contrary, & would haue had an other to haue bene chosen. For, he him selfe was euery other yeare generall. So, Lyfidas was chosen againe generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with euery bodies good will: and Aratus and he had absolute power and gouernment by turnes, one after the other. But when they saw that Lyfidas became open enemy vnto Aratus, and did still accuse him in all their counsels and assemblies: they fell in such misliking with him, that they reiected him. For they thought his but a couiteuse vertue, to contend with the perfumes of Aratus vertue. Much like vnto one of Isopes fables, saying that litle birdes did answer the cuckow on a tyme, asking them why they did flie from her: bicause we are affrayd (sayd they) thou wilt be asper-hawke one day. Euen so it seemeth, that there was a certaine suspicion in mens minds of Lyfidas tyranny, which made them mistrust that he went not from his tyrannie with good will. Now Aratus on thother side, wanne as great praise and honor by his doings against the ETOLIANS. For when the ACHAIANS would needes haue fought vpon the confines of the territory of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis, king of LACEDEMON, being come with his army to the campe of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perfwade them hardly to giue battell: Aratus was stowely against it, and did abide many mocks and tawnts they gaue him, saying, that it was for cowardlines he would not goe. This notwithstanding, he would not leaue his wife and safe determination, for all that open shame: but suffered the enemies to passe ouer the Mountaine Gerania, and to inuade PELOPONNESVS, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, when he saw that at their first coming they had taken the citie of PALLENIA: he then chaiged his mind, and would deferre time no longer to rary till all his power were come together, but marched forthwith against his enemies, with those few he had, who maruelously weakened them selues by their infoleny and disorder after their victory, keeping no watch nor warde.

D For after they had entred the citie of PALLENIA, the soldiers ranne into euery house, one thrusting in an others necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Capitaines also fell to rauishing of maidens, and the PALLENIANS wiues, and put their burganets and morrions vpon their heades, that none other should take them, bicause that by the same the souldiers should know whose they were, and to whome the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and ill will: newes came sodainly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they saw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderstoode of the danger by their sodaine setting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting already within the suburbs and gates of the citie, against the first that resisted, whome they slue. They being broken, & put to flight, made the rest so affraid that were gathered together to ayde them, that they wist not what to doe. In this tumult and great hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a prisoner, that was the Daughter of Epigethes one of the noblest men of the citie, and she a maruelous goodly woman, and passing fayer: who being set in the temple of Diana, whether a Captaine had brought her that had chosen her for him selfe, and had put his burganet on her head: (so sodainly ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, when she heard the noyse of them that fought, to see them fight. The Citizens seeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maiesty, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other side were so affraid to see her, thinking she had bene some spirit: that not a man of them durst open defend them selues. So the PALLENIANS say, that the image of Diana all the rest of the tyme is kept locked vp, and no body toucheth it, and that when the Nunne that keepeth it doth carry it elsewhere, no man dare looke on it, but euery man turneth his eyes away: bicause the sight of it is not only fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it also killeth the fruite of the trees it passeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cause that then troubled the Æ- Aratus set forth vpon his lasciuious enemies.

Aratus with a burganet of her head, seemed a woman from thing.

The figure of Diana with the Pallens one.

TOLLIANS mindes so muche, because the Nunne remouing the image of the goddesse Diana, A he turned it towards them. Howbeit Aratus in his commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chase, he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and slue feuen hundred of them. This noble victory hath bene esteemed amonge the chieft afterwards: and the paynter Timantides hath drawn and set it forth in table very liuely. This notwithstanding, because diuers Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the ACHAIANS: Aratus presently made peace with the ÆTOLIANS by the practise of Panta- leon, who bare great waye and authoritie amongst them. Furthermore, Aratus being des-sireous to set the ATHENIANS at libertie, he sodainly attempted to take the haven of PIREA: for which the ACHAIANS reprocued him, because he had broken the peace they had made with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his commentaries doth stoutly denye that it was he, and layeth the fault vpon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acro- corinthe: saying that it was he, that of his owne minde did set a scaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking vnder him, he fell vpon it, and perceiving he was followed neare by the enemies, he fyll cryed out, Aratus, as if he had bene there, and by this pollicye mocked his enemies, and saued him selfe. Howbeit me thinkes this aunswer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a priuate fouldier, and a SYRIAN borne, shoulde haue so greates an enterprise in his head, vnles it had bene by Aratus consent and commandement, who had giuen him men, tyme, and meanes to vndertake it. And this appeared playnly afterwards. For, Aratus did not attempt it twyse or thrise onely, but oftener then so (as those that extremely desire a thinge) to take the haven of PIREA on the sodaine, not giuing ouer for once sayling, but rather imboldening him selfe agayne with good hope, because he mist it but litle, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another tyme also amongst others, flying through the playne of TRIASTIA, he brake his legge, and was driven to haue many incisions to heale it: so that he was a long tyme together caryed in his lytter to the warres. After that king Antigonus was deade, and that Demetrius his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome: he attempted then more earnestly then euer before, to set the citie of ATHENS at libertie, making small accompt of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus therefore beeing ouerthrowen in battell neare vnto PHYLACIA, by king Demetrius Lieutenant, called Bithys: and the rumor running straight abroad, that Aratus was deade, or at the least that he was taken prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the haven of PI- REA, wrote a letter vnto CORINTHE, and commaunded the garrison of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliuer the towne, for Aratus was deade. But he by chaunce was at the selfe same tyme in CORINTHE: so that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the company meary. Furthermore, king Demetrius him selfe sent a gallye out of MACEDON, to bringe Aratus bound vnto him. The ATHENIANS them selues also, to please the MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightnes of flattery, ware gar-lands of their heads a whole day together, in token of common ioy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so mad in his minde to heare this, that he brought his armye presently againtt them, euen to the very suburbs of the Academy. Notwithstanding, at their earnest request, he did no hurt there. And afterwards, the ATHENIANS acknowlding his valliantties, when king Demetrius dyed: it tooke them in the heads to recouer their libertye againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bedde, lying sicke of a longe disease: yet to further this, he was caried to ATHENS in a lytter, and so perswaded Diogenes, Captaine of the garrison there, that for the summe of a hundred and fifty talentes (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer the ATHENIANS the haven of PIREA, the castell of MYNTIC- HERIA, the Ile of SALAMINA, and the castell of SVNIVM. After this, the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the moste part of ARCADIA it selfe, did presently ioyne with the ACHAIANS: so that the MACEDONIANS being occupied with warres at that tyme in other places againtt their neighbours, the power of the ACHAIANS maruelously increased, hauing also the ÆTOLIANS their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his olde

A promise, and being angrie to see the citie of ARGOS (being so neere neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage: he sent vnto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his citie againc at libertie, and to ioyne it to the tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lysidas had done his towne of MEGALOPOLIS, and rather too like to be made a Generall with honor and praise of so great and famous a state as the ACHAIANS: then tyrant of one only citie, hated, and euerie hower of the night and day in daunger of his life. Aristomachus gaue care to his perswasions, and sent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talentes to discharge the fouldiers he had about him: The money was straight prepared. And Lysidas that was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that marueloullie desired this matter might be brought to passe by his meanes: he secretlie sent vnto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed howe he had bene alway a mortall enemy vnto tyrants, and therefore counsellled him rather to put him selfe into his hands, as in deede he did. For, Lysidas brought Aristomachus vnto the counsell of the ACHAIANS. There all the counsell plainlie shewed their good wills, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he spake againtt it, that they should not receiue Aristomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was wonne, and that he began to moue the contrarie to the counsell: they straight agreed to receiue the ARGIVES, and the PHLIASIANS in league with them, and also the next yeare following, they chose Aristomachus Lieutenaunt generall of all their tribe. Aristomachus seeing him selfe in credit nowe with the ACHAIANS, would needs invade the contrie of LACONIA with a maine armie, and sent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wished him in any wise not to meddle with that iorney, because he would not haue the ACHAIANS to deale with Cleomenes, king of LACEDÆMON, that was a coragious and flowt young Prince, and marueloullie gro-wen in short tisme. Howbeit Aristomachus being selfe willed in that poynt, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in person all that iorney. So Cleomenes being come to them vpon the sodaine with his armie, neere vnto the citie of PALANTIVM: Aristomachus would needs fight with him. But Aratus dissuaded him from it. Whereupon Lysidas afterwards accused him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yeare following he contented with him, suing to be Generall: howbeit he was reiectd by most voyces, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth tyme. The selfe same yeare he was ouerthrowen in battell by Cleomenes, neere vnto the mountaine LYCAVM, and being fled, wandered vp and downe in the night, that euerie man thought he had bene slaine, and it ranne for good payment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit he saued himselfe, and hauing gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had scaped with life, but wiselie taking the oportunitie and occasion offered, no man knowing it, nor mistrus-ting his comming: he sodainlie went to assaile the MANTINIANS, which were confede-rats of Cleomenes, and hauing taken the citie of MANTINEA, he left a great garrison in it, and made the straungers that were there, free of the citie. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome wanne the ACHAIANS that, which they them selues could scarcely haue wonne, if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, the LACEDÆMONIANS invading the territories of the MEGALOPOLITANS with a great armie, Aratus sodainlie went thither to aide them; but would hazard battell no more, nor geue Cleomenes vantage, who desired only to fight, and still E constantlie resisted the MEGALOPOLITANS, that provoked him to come to the field. For besides that in nature he was not meete for a set battell, at that time also he was the weaker in men, and had to doe with a venterous young man; that was all fire: where his corage and ambicion on the other side was coole, & quiet enough. Furthermore he considered, that as king Cleomenes sought honor by valliant venturing, which he had not before: euen so it was his parte wiselie to keepe that which he had long since gotten; and to stande vpon his gard and safetie. This notwithstanding, the light armed men being put out into the fildes, and hauing chased the LACEDÆMONIANS euen into their campe, & entring in with the hand ouer heads: Aratus would neuer bring out his citizens, but stayed them in a great valley that lay betwene them both, and would not let them come any further. Wherewithall Lysidas being mad F with him selfe, and falling out with Aratus: he called for the hostemen, & said that he would yet helpe them that followed the chase, and prayed them not to lose the victory so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to forsake him at a pinche, fighting for defence of these contrie. So hauing gotten a great number of choise horsemen together, he went with great A furie, & gaue charge of the right wing of his enemies battell, & hauing disperfed them, and put them to flight, he vnadvisedlie followed them with great corage, into euill fauoured crooked wayes, among trees, and great broad dirches. VV hereupon Cleomenes came, and so lustely fet on him, that he slue him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending him selfe. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in againe into the battell of the footemen, and so disordered their ranks, that they made all their armie flie for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had forsaken Lysidas: & being forced vnto it by the A-CHAIANS that went without his leaue, he followed them at length, and fled him selfe also vnto the city of Ægium. There the ACHAIANS sitting in counsell, they decreed that they would furnish Aratus with no more money, neither would they pay his straungers any more: & bad B him pay them at his owne charge, if he would enterteine them for the warre. Aratus perceiuing they did him great wrong, tooke euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commission of Lieu-tenancy, and to discharge him selfe of his office: but after he had bethought him selfe better, he bare it pacientlie, and led the ACHAIANS directlie to the cite of ORCHOMENE. There he valliantly fought with Megistomus, king Cleomenes father in lawe, and had the vpper hande of him: for he slue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megistomus selfe prisoner. Furthermore, where before euerie second year they did vie to chooſe him their Lieutenant generall: when his turne came about againe, they called him to geue him the office, but he refused it, and Ti- mocheus was chosen in his roome. Now the cause alleaged for his refusal, was sayd to be, for that he misliked of the common people. But that foundeth like a lye: for the truth of it, to my seeming was, for that he saw the state of the ACHAIANS to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more fayer and soſilie as he did at the first, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori: but hauing slaine them, and equalle deuided the landes through all LACEDÆ- MONIA, and made the straungers free citizens of SPARTA, being then absolute Lorde of LACEDÆ- MONIA, he straight set vpon the ACHAIANS with all the power he coule, and fought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deserueth iust reproofe, for that he forooke his contrie in such extreme trouble & dainger, that being as the maister of a shippe he gaue an other the sterne to steare, when it had bene most honorable & meetest for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not haue giuen it him) to haue saued his contrie. Or otherwise, if he had in dede viterly dispaired of the good successe of the ACHAIANS, he should then haue put it rather into Cleomenes handes, and not to haue paysoned PELOPONNESVS againe, with the ma-ners of the barbarous people: (bringing in as he did, the garrison of the MACEDONIANS, filling the castell of the Acrocorinthe with GAVLES and ILLYRIAN souldiers, and making them his Lordes and maisters, whom he had so often ouercomen in warres, and decieued of their go-uernment, and of whom he also spake to much euill in his Commentaries) nor to haue put them into townes, and calling them friends and confederates, to thinke thereby to colour and disguise his wicked practise. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyrant, and a cruell man (if I should to equate him) yet came he of the blood of Hercules, and was borne in SPARTA: from whence they should rather haue chosen the meanest man Gouvernor, then the greatest king of MACEDONIA, and thole speciallie that preferre the honor and glorie of GREECE, before straungers. E Yet king Cleomenes required no more of all the ACHAIANS, but the name onely to be their Lieutenant generall: and so they would graunt him that honor, he promised he would be vnto good vnto the cities confederats to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenant generall with absolute power and authoritie, both by sea and by lande, refused the charge, vnlesse they would let him haue the castell of the Acro- corinthe for his byer. The which was euen like to Elopes hunter, that bridled his horse. For he would not gett vpon the ACHAIANS that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors and decrees of counsell did referre all to him selfe: before he had first saddled and bridled them; by the garrison he made them receiue, and the pledges he caused them to geue him, and yet he spake as much as might be to cleere him selfe of the accusation against him, bearing them in hande that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius wryteth, that long time before he was compelled, being affrayed of Cleomenes valliantnes, he had secretly practised that with

A Antigonus, which he was openlie scene in afterwards: and that he had intified the MEGALOPOLITANS (who were the first that moued it to the counsell of the ACHAIANS) to call king Antigonus to their aide, because they were nearest neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes warre, that alwaies knocked at their gates to come and spoyle them. Thus muche is affirmed by Phylarchus in his historie, who were hardlie to be credited notwithstanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes so well, that it seemed he was ratified with some spirite as often as he spake of him: and frameth his historie, as a common counsellor that should pleade a case in lawe before the Iudges, still accusing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS lost the cite of MEGALIPOLIS againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell, by Hecatombæon. Where-B withall they were so amazed, that they sent Ambassadors presentlie vnto him, & prayed him to come to the cite of ARGOS, & there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. But when Aratus heard he came in dede, and that he was not farre from the cite of LEBNA with his armie: being affrayed, he sent other Ambassadors to tell him that he should safelie come with three hundred men only, as vnto his frends and confederats, and yet if he mistrusted craft and euill dealing, that then they would geue him pledges for the safetie of his person. Cleo- menes answered him, that was a plaine mockerie, and an iniurie they offered him. Wherefore, he presentlie departed thence, and sent a letter before to the counsell of the ACHAIANS, full of fowle words and reproaches he gaue vnto Aratus. VVho likewise replied to him againe, bitterlie taunting eache other, that they came to talke of their marriage and wiues. After this C letter, Cleomenes sent defiance by a Heralde vnto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open warre against them: in so muche as he had almost gotten the cite of SICYONA by practise of traitors. Howbeit failing of his purpose, he returned sodainly, and went vnto the city of PERI- LENA, which he tooke, and draue out the Generall of the ACHAIANS thence, and immediatly after he wanne the cities also of PHENEAS and PENTELION. After that, the ARGIVES and PELISIANS willinglie yeelded vnto him, so that of all that which the ACHAIANS had conquered, and ioyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of nothing else of certeinly vnto them.
 Then Aratus was maruelouslie troubled in his mind, to see all PELOPONNESVS in tumult and vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by those that practised change and alteracion. For no man was contented with the state and government at that time, but diuers of D the SICYONIANS & CORINTHIANS both were bewrayed which had secretlie practised with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the government of the ACHAIANS, desiring them selues to be Lords and Gouvernors of their cities. Aratus hauing full commission and authori-tie from the counsell of the ACHAIANS, to make inquerie of them, and to put them to death without further trial of law: he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faultie in the city of SICYONA. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at CORINTHE, he made inquerie of them, & put them to death: whereby he made the common people very angry with him, who otherwise of them selues were weary of the government & subiection of the ACHAIANS. The CORINTHIANS therefore gathering together in the temple of Apollo, they sent for Aratus, in-E tending to make him prisoner before they would openly enter into actuell rebellion. Aratus went thither, to shewe that he neither feared nor mistrusted them, but yet he helde his horse in his hand following of him. Then many rose vp against him, and did both reprove & intreat him to intreat him. But Aratus with a stayed countenance and gentle words, prayed them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in such rage vpon their seere, and wishall, caused them also to come in that were at the temple dore. But as he spake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the presse, as though he ment to haue geuen his horse to some bodie to hold. So being gotten out of the presse, he gently spake without any feare vnto the CORINTHIANS he met, and bad them goe to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the castell, he then sodainly tooke his horse backe, and commaunded Cleopater, Captaine of the garrison of the A-CHAIANS there, to looke well to the safe keeping of the castell. Then he set spurs to his horse, F and galloped towards the cite of SICYONA for life, being followed onely by thirthe of his souldiers, all the rest hauing forsaken him, and disperfed them selues here and there. Shortly after, the CORINTHIANS vnderstanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they straight sent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie A of CORINTHES into his hands, the gaine whereof pleased him not so much, as he was forie for the losse of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling alongest the sea coast, commonlie called the riuer of CORINTHES, who yielded vnto them selues, holdes and townes into his hands: he then intrenched in the castell of the Acrocorinthe with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of SICYONE, many of the ACHAIANS gathered about him, and holding a counsell and assemblee, he was chosen their Lieutenant generall, hauing absolute power and authoritie to doe what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to gard his person. So, he hauing managed the affaires of the state and common wealth of the ACHAIANS, the space of three and thirtie yeares together, and hauing all that time bene counted of all men, the chiefeft man of power and authoritie in GRÆCE: he then found him selfe in poore estate, forsaken, and in great miserie, as in the shippewrackle of his contrie beaten with storme, and in great daunger of him selfe. For when he sent vnto the ÆTOLIANS for aide, they staid denied him, and would send him none. Furthermore, the ATHENIANS being verie desirous to send aide for Aratus sake, were dissuaded from it through the practise of Euclides, & Micion. Aratus also had a house in CORINTHES, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the first meddled not withall, neither would suffer any other to touche it, but sent for his frendes and officers, and charged them to looke well to it, to geue Aratus a good accompt of it afterwards. Furthermore, he priuately sent Triphyllus vnto him, and his father in law Megisthenes, and offered him great gifts, and specialle an annuall pencion of twelue talents, which was double as much as king Prology gaue him, who sent him yearly six talents. Besides, he only prayed the ACHAIANS that they would make him their Lieutenant general, & also that the garrison in the castell of the Acrocorinthe, might be deuicid in common betwene them. Aratus made aunswere, that he had no absolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a deuise and excuse of Aratus, he presentlie inuaded the contrie of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed all as he came, and continued the space of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time stood doubtfull how to determine, whether he should receiue king Antigonus or not: bicause Antigonus would not aide him, before he deliuered him the castell of the Acrocorinthe into his hands. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the citie of ÆGIUM to consult vpon it, they sent for Aratus thither. Howebeit it was dangerous comming thither, bicause Cleomenes campe lay hard by the citie of SICYONE, besides also that the citizens kept Aratus, and helde him by force, saying that they would not let him venter him selfe in such apparant daunger, their enemies being so neere vnto them. Moreouer, the women and litle children hong about him, weeping, and compassing him about, as their common father and sauior. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be affrayed, and so tooke his horse, with ten of his frends (and his sonne that was a young stripling growen) and went towards the sea, and imbarke in certaine shippes that roade at anchor. Thence he sailed vnto ÆGIUM, where the diet or parliament was kept: and there it was resolved, that they should sende for Antigonus, and deliuer the castell of the Acrocorinthe into his hands. And so it was performed: for Aratus sent thither his owne sonne among the other ostages. The CORINTHIANS were so fore offended withall, that they E made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his house he had in CORINTHES, vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwarde on his way to come into PELOPONNESVS with his armie, bringing with him twentie thousand footemen, all MACEDONIANS, & foure hundred horsemen: Aratus, with the greatest states and officers of the ACHAIANS, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him, as farre as the citie of PEGES, hauing no great trust nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembered verie well, that he came first to his greates, by the iniuries he had offered them: and howe that the chiefeft cause of his rising, was the malice he bare vnto olde Antigonus. Howbeit, making vertue of necessitie, and weying the instant occasion of their present extremite: (of Gouernours, to be driuen to be subjects) he put him selfe in aduerture. So, when Antigonus was tolde that Aratus was comen in F person to him: hauing with good countenance after a common for saluted those that came in his companie: to Aratus selfe at his first comming he gaue him an honorable welcome and enter-

A entertainment. Afterwardes also, finding him a good and discrete man: he fell into inward frendshipp and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skillfull to geue direction in matters of state touching good order and gouernment: but moreouer, his companie & conuersation was verie pleasaunt, to entertaine a Princes leasure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but young at that time, yet seeing thoroughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and esteemed about a Prince: he vsed his counsell and aduise more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS also. And so all things came to passe, which the goddes had promised in their sacrifices. For in a beast that was sacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one selfe cawle: the which the Soothsayers interpreted did prognosticate, that two which B before were mortall enemies, should now become assured frendes. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did also geue any credit to the sacrifices, but trusted more to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwarde hauing good successe, and Antigonus making a fealt in the citie of CORINTHES, where he had bidden many ghefts: he would nedes haue Aratus lye vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commaunded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a colde. Aratus answered him, it freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neerer him: & when the seruants brought a couerlet for the king, they cast it ouer them both. Then Aratus remembre the sacrifice, fell a laughing, and tolde the king what a wonder he had seene in the sacrifice, & what interpretation the Soothsayers made of it. This was long after. So, Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the citie of PEGES, they were sworn brethren together: and then went both with all speede against the enemies. Thus there fell out nor skirmishes betwene them, hard by the citie of CORINTHES. For Cleomenes was verie well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended them selues. In the meane time, Aristoteles of ARGOS, (Aratus friend) secretlie sent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came him selfe with any number of soldiars. Aratus tolde it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fiftene hundred men, with the which he imbarke, and passed ouer with great speede from the Isthmus (or barre in the straight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRYM. Howbeit the ARGIVES taried not Aratus comming, but were all vp before he came, and did set vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driuen them into the castell. Cleomenes being aduertised of it, and fearing least his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS) D should cut of his way from returning into his contrie againe with safetie if he were driuen to a straight: he forooke the castell of the Acrocorinthe, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the citie of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrew certene of his enemies. But shortly after, Aratus, and king Antigonus both being comen thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driuen to flic to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recovery againe of the citie of ARGOS, all the residue of the cities of PELOPONNESVS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus tooke the castell of the Acrocorinthe. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the ARGIVES, he counsellled them to present Antigonus with all the tyrans goodes, and those that had bene traitors to the common wealth. And after they had cruellie tormentted the tyran Arisomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the ende they cast him into the sea, E and drowned him. Aratus was marueloullie reproued for his death, that he would suffer the poore man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleasure: who through his perswasion willinglie resigned vp his tyrannie, and deliuered the city of ARGOS vnto the ACHAIANS. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things else. For that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the citie of CORINTHES into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene some meane village: for that when they had sacked the citie of ORCHOMENE, they suffered him to place a garrison of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by parliament, that they should neither write, nor sende Ambassadors any whether, without Antigonus priuite and consent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to geue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made sacrifices, feastes, and games F vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god, following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the first that began, and had receiued Antigonus into the city by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne house. With all these faults they burdened Aratus, and considered nor that after they had put the reynes of the gouernment into Antigonus hand, Aratus him selfe (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the swing of the vnbridled Prince, hauing no other meanes to stay it, but only the libertie of speache to admonish him; and that also was not to be exercised, without apparant and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus minde, as amongst others: that Antigonus caused the tyrannical images of Argos to be set vp, which he had before pulled downe: and also that he made them to be ouerthrowen, which Aratus had set vp for those that had taken the castell of Corinthe, and only left Aratus owne statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no graunt of any thing he requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the Achaians delt not so friendly with the Mantiniens, as became Greecians one to another. For they hauing the citie in their hands by Antigonus means, did put all the noblest and chiefeest men of Mantineia to death, others they sold as slaues, and sent the rest into Macedon with irons on their legges, and brought the poore women & children into bondage, and sold them for slaues: and of the money they got by spoile, they deuided the third parte among them selues, and left the other two partes vnto the Macedonians. Nowe surely it can not be sayd, but this was done for some cruell reuenge. For though it was an ouergreat crueltie, in rage & passion of minde, to handle people of one selfe blood and language in this lamentable sorte: yet, as Simonides saith, when men are driuen and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomackes inflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the citie, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say that he was either driuen to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to doe it. For king Antigonus hauing geuen the citie of Mantineia vnto the Argiues, they determined to make it a Colonie, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a decree, that therefore the citie should no more be called Mantineia, but Antigonia, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it seemeth that gentle Mantineia (for so the Poets called it) was vtterlie destroyed, and bare the name of an other citie through Aratus means, preferring the name of him that destroyed the city, & did put all the inhabitants of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrowen in a great battell by the citie of Sellasia, he left the citie of Sparta, and fled into Egypt. So Antigonus hauing vsed Aratus with all kind of honorable curtesie, he returned againe into Macedon. There falling sick, he sent Philip that should succede him in the kingdom (being a young stripling growen) into Peloponnesus, and straightly charged him speciallie to followe Aratus counsell, and to imploy him when he would speake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the Achaians. So Aratus hauing receiued him in that sorte, made him so well affected and louing towards him, that he sent him againe into Macedon, being throughlie determined to make warres with Grece. So after the death of Antigonus, the Aetolians beganne to despise the carelesnesse and cowardlinesse of the Achaians (bicause that they being acquainted to be defended by strangers, and hauing bene altogether gouerned by the armies of the Macedonians, they liued verie idly & dissolutely) whereupon they tooke vpon them to make them selues Lords of Peloponnesus. So they assembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they only tooke some pray and spoyle vpon the lands of the Patreians, and the Dymeians: but inuading the territorie of Messina with all their armie, they destroyed the whole contrie before them. Aratus being angrie withall, and perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was Generall of the Achaians) did still tract and delay time in vaine, bicause he was vpon his going out of his yeare: he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fife dayes before, to goe and aide the Messenians. Wherefore, leauing an armie of the Achaians, whose persons were now neither exercised in armes, nor yet had any desire to goe to the warres: he was ouerthrowen by the citie of Caphyes. Nowe, bicause it was thought that he went somewhat too hottely and coragiously to the warres, he so extremely cooled againe, and left things in such case, that all hope being cast a side, he suffered the Aetolians in manner to tread Peloponnesus vnder their fete, before his eyes, with all the infolencie and crueltie that might be possible, notwithstanding that they fundrie times gaue him great aduantage of them. Thus were the Achaians once againe forced to playe aie out of Mantineia, called Antigonia, by Aratus decree.

Aratus ouerthrowen in battell, by the citie of Caphyes.

A of Macedon, and to send for young king Philippe to make warres in Grece: hoping for the loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great trust he had in him, that he would vse them gently, and doe as they would haue him. But then first of all beganne Apelles, Megaraeus, and a few other Courties to accuse Aratus: vnto whome king Philippe geuing easie care, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was chosen Generall by the Achaians. Howebeit this newe Generall Eparatus beinge extreamelie hated by the Achaians, and Aratus also leauing to deale any more with matters of state: no acte was done to any purpose. Whereupon king Philippe findinge his faulte, returned againe vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires prospered in all things he went about, he then lette him alone withall, as from whome came all his honour and greatness. Thereupon euerie man esteemed Aratus a wise Gouvernour, not only to rule a common wealth, but also a whole realme and kingdome. For his manners, intent, and chiefeest purpose appeared, in the deedes of this young king, as a riche colour that did sette forth and beawtifie them. For the clemencie this young Prince Philippe vsed to the Lacedaemonians, that had offended him: the great curtesie he shewed to the Cretans, whereby in fewe dayes he wanne all the Ile of Creta: and the iorney he made against the Aetolians, which was a wonderfull great exploit: wanne the Prince great fame, for following good counsell, and Aratus accounted to be a wise Gouvernour, and of deepe vnderstanding. Nowe the kings flatterers enuying Aratus more then before, and perceiuing that they got no good by secret backebiting of him: they then beganne with open mouth verie insolentlie to reuile him at the table, and with great defision: in somuch as one night going home to his tent after supper, they pelted him with stones all the way as he went. King Philippe when he knewe it, was so offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the summe of twentie talentes: and afterwards also, bicause they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philippe in the ende being puffed vp with the good fortune and successe of this warre, which prospered as he would haue it: he then grew to be couetous, and beganne to shewe his naughtie nature, and to bewray his dissimulation wherewith he disguised him selfe: and by litle and litle to make his vices plainlie to appeare. For first of all, he abused young Aratus wife, which was kept secret a long time, bicause he lay in their house, and beganne dayly to growe more seuerer and cruell to the common weales: and then the world sawe plainlie, that he cared no more for Aratus. For the first suspicion and beginning of the mistrust he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at Messina. For the Messenians being fallen together by the eares, and in great ciuill warres one with another: Aratus went thither to make peace betwene them. Howebeit king Philippe came thither the next day following, and in steade of pacifying the quarrell, he set them further out together then they were before. First he asked the Gouvernours of the citie, and if they had no lawes to bridle the infolencie and stomacke of the common people: and privatelie also talked with the heades of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not handes to defende them selues from tyrannes. So both the one and the other faction trustinge to kinge Philippe, the Gouvernours would haue layed holde of the Orators of the citie: but they risinge with the common people, slewed of their Nobilitie and Magistrates, well neere two hundred of them. Aratus that came soone after this fact, shewed that he was greatly offended with king Philippe, and caused his sonne with open mouth shamefullie to reprove him. Nowe it seemed that this young Aratus was in loue with king Philippe before: but then he tolde him before all the people; that for this shamefull acte he had done, he thought him nowe no more fayer of face, but the fowleest creature that could be. Philippe made no answer to it, although euerie man looked he would haue answered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproued him, he byt it in with his teeth: but as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge words his sonne had spoken against him, for that he was a ciuill man, and mylde of nature, he tooke Aratus the father by the hande, and carried him out of the Theater where the assemble was kept, to the castell of Ithome, to doe sacrifice there to Iupiter, and to see the forte. This forte was of no lesse strength then the castell of the Acrocorinthe: and when any garrison is in it, it keepeth all the contrie about it in obedience, and besides, it is verie hard to drue them out of it. Now Philip being gotten vp into that castell, he did sacrifice there: and when the Soothsayer had brought him the intralls of the oxe which they had sacrificed, he rooke it him selfe with both his hands and shewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius Phalerian, now turning to the one, then vnto the other, and asked them what they iudged of these signes of the sacrifice: whether he shoulde keepe the castell to him selfe, or else deliuer it to the Messenians. Demetrius smiling answered him: if thou beest of the Soothsayers minde, then thou shalt deliuer it vp: but if thou halt a kinges minde in thee, thou shalt then holde the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he ment the contrie of Peloponnesvs, and moreouer, that if he kept both these castells of Ithome, and the Acrocorinthe, all Peloponnesvs were wholly at his commaundement.) Aratus still held his peace, and sayd not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to speake he said, In Creta, and in the contrie of the Boeotians and Phocians, there are many strong castells situated on high hills from the vallies. Moreouer, there are also many places of great strength in the marches of the Aarnanians, both within maine land, as also vpon the sea coast: of all the which thou hast not taken one of them by force, and yet they all doe willingly obey thee notwithstanding. It is for theecues to hyde their heades in high rockes & mountaines: but a king can haue no stronger castell, then the loue, faith, and good will of men. That is it that opened the sea of Creta. That is it that hath brought thee into Peloponnesvs. Those are the meanes which haue made thee being so young a man, some of them to choofe thee their Captaine, and others also to make thee their absolute Lorde and Maister. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gaue the intralls againe to the Soothsayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand, (as if by force he had cast him out of the castell, and had also taken the cite of Messina from him) sayd vnto him: come on then, lette vs euen take that course. But after that time, Aratus came as leide to the Court as might be, and so by litle and litle left *Philip*s companie. For when he went to make warre in the realme of Epirvs, he was earnestlie in hand with Aratus to goe that iorney with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excused, and so remained at home, being affrayed to be brought into an euill name with *Philip*s doings. For Philip afterwards hauing shamefullie lost his armie by sea, against the Romanes, & besides, hauing had also verie euill successe in all other his affaires: he returned againe to Peloponnesvs, & thought once more to haue deceived the Messenians. But when they founde his practise, then he beganne with open force to spoyle their contrie. Aratus then flatlie fell out with Philip, and vtterly refused his frendship, for that he perceived then the iniurie he had done his sonnes wife, the which grieved him to the harte, but yet he made not his sonne priuie to it: bicause he coulde gette no other amendes, then to knowe what iniurie had bene done to him, considering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuenged. For, king Philip was maruelously changed, and from a courteous and chaste young Prince, becomen a vitious and cruell tyran: the which to speake truely, was not a change or alteration in nature, but a manifest declaracion (when he was no more affrayed of any man) of his wicked and deuillish mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept secret. Now, to proue that *Philip*s first loue and good will he bare vnto Aratus, was also mingled with feare and reuerence: that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainly shew it. For he being desirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking him selfe free so long as he liued, neither king, nor tyran: he durst not goe about to kill him him selfe, but procured one of his Capitaines called Taurion, and commaunded him to make him away as secretly as he could possible, & specially with poyson, in his absence. This Taurion fell in frendship with Aratus, and poysoned him with no violent poyson, but so tempered & qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the bodie, and procure a pretie coffe which brought him into a consumption. Aratus knewe he was poysoned, but bicause he sawe it booted not to bewray it, he bare it pacientlie, and made no words of it, as if he had had some naturall disease about him. Yet on a time, one of his chieftest frends being in his chamber with him, who wondred to see him spit blood as he did: he told him, frid Cephalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poyson in the city of Ægimvs, being the seauenteenth time chosen Generall of the Achaïans: who would haue had him buried in the selfe same place, and haue made some honorable monument for him, worthy

A worthie of his noble life. But the Sicyonians thinking them selues dishonored, if his body were buried any where else but in their owne cite: they so perswaded the counsell of the Achaïans, that they suffered them to take Aratus bodie with them. Yet was there an auncient law that forbad buriall within the walls of the cite, of any maner of person whatsoever: and besides that law, they had a certaine superstitious feare in them that made them they durst not. Whereupon they sent to Apollos temple at Delphes, to aske counsell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles, who made them this aunswere.

*Thou happie soile of Sicyon, Aratus natie place, Vt heres thou askest counsell in that noble Capitaines case, For keeping of a yeare minde and for making feastfull dayes In honor of that worthie wright, to last henceforth alwayes:
If any hinder your intent through fundres or through spite, Both sea and land and heauen it selfe will punish that same wright.*

This Oracle being brought, all the Achaïans were maruelous glad of it, but the Sicyonians speciallie: who presentlie changing their mourning into publike ioy, they caried the bodie from the cite of Ægimvs, & brought it home as in manner of proceffion, in white robes, and garlands of flowers on their heades, singing hymes and songes of ioy, and daunting, till they came to the cite of Sicyon. And there they chose out the chieftest place, and buried him as their founder, father, and fauor of their cite: and the place is called at this present time, Aratimvs. There they yearly make two solemne sacrifices, the one the fift of Nouember, at which time he deliuered the cite of Sicyon from tyrannie, & they call this sacrifice Soteria, as much to say, as the feast of health: and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the first sacrifice, that was done by the Priest of Iupiter the fauor. The second sacrifice also was done by Aratus sonne, who was girt about with a cloth, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the sacrifice, they long hymes vpon the harpe in praise of him, and the maister of the Musicians made a proceffion round about, being accompanied with boyes and young men of the cite, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were disposed to goe a proceffion. Howbeit the most part of the honors that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left off by proceffe of time, & change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you see what the life of Aratus the father hath bene, as we find in hiltories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, caused his sonne Aratus also to be poysoned, not with a deadly poyson, but with such poyson as troubleth a mans wits so, that through their deuillish receit, he becometh a starke foole without any wit at all, and maketh him to attempt strange and abhominable things, and to haue certaine shamefull and detestable desires: inso much as his death (though he dyed in the prime of his youth) could not be thought miserable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him of all his miseries and mishappes. But Philip afterwards, so long as he liued, payed vnto Iupiter (protector of all iustice and frendship) the punishment his wicked life deserued. For, after he was overcome in battell by the Romanes, he was compelled to yeelde him selfe to their mercy, by whome he was depriued from all the rest of his landes and dominions he had: and of all his shippes, but five only, and condemned besides to pay a thousand talents for a fine, and to giue his sonne in hostage: and they only left him for pitties sake, the kingdom of Macedon, with all the appertenaunces. And there he daily putting to death the chieftest of his nobilitie, and nearest of blood vnto him: he filled his realme with crueltie and mortall hate against him. Furthermore, amongst such a heape of euills, hauing but one onely ioy, to haue a vertuous sonne: he put him to death, for spyte and malice that he saw the Romanes honor him, & left his other sonne Perseus successor of his realme: who, as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten sonne, but taken for his sonne, and borne of a taylors wife called Gnatobionne. It is that Perseus whom Paulus Aemilius overcame and led in triumphe in Rome: and at him, the race of the kings descended from Antigonus, failed. Where the issue and offspring of Aratus continueth yet vntill our time, in the cities of Sicyon, and Pallena.

Iphicrates the Athenian Captaine sayd, that a mercenarie souldier should be couerous, a louter, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleasure, he should be the vallianter, and readier to put him selfe into any danger. But most men thinke, that souldiers should be as one entere strong body, that sturreth not of it selfe without the mouing of the general. And to approve this opinion, it is said that Paulus Aemilius aruiing in Macedon, and finding the souldiers full of words and curiositie (euerie man meddling with the affaires of the General) he made open proclamacion, no man so hardy to meddle with his office and affaires, but every man only to keepe his sword sharpe, and to be quicke of hand against the enemy: and for the rest, to referre all to him, who would take sufficient order for things of his charge and government. Therefore Plato, that saith it litle preuaileth to haue a good and wise Captaine, if the souldiers also be not wise and obedient, thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to haue men of a noble minde and good education, as otherwise it is meete for a Captaine to know how to direct and commaunde well, considering it is that which with lenity & mildnes doth mitigate all fury and choller: he hath diuers other examples and sufficient proofes to proue his words true, and namely, the great miseries and calamities which came to the ROMANES after the death of Nero, do plainly shew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great armie liuing licentiouslie and disorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexander the great, compared Alexanders armie, vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: considering howe blindly and loofelie they were gouerned. Howebeit the Empire of ROME being deuided into fundrie factions at one selfe time, and rising against it selfe in many places, it fell into the like misfortunes and calamities fained of the Poets by the TITANS: not so much through the ambitiousnes of the Emperours, as by meanes of the couetousnes & infolency of the souldiers, who draue the Emperours out of their Imperiall seates one after another, as one naile driueth out another. And Dionysius also the tyraine of SICILIA, was wont to call Pheraus, who had bene onely tyrant of THESSALY tenne monethes space: a tyrant in a play, deriding his so sodaine change of state. But the Imperiall house of the Cæsars at ROME received foure Emperours, in lesse then tenne monethes space, the souldiers now putting in one, and then taking out another, as if they had bene

A bene in a play on a scaffold. So that, the ROMANES being thus grieuouſlie oppressed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to seeke to be reuenged of them that did oppress them. For they sawe one of them murder another, and him first and most iustlie of all other murdered, that had first of all corrupted the souldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of Emperours: and so deprauing a worthie deede of it selfe, which was their forsaking of Nero: and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperours gard, which are called the Prætorian souldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he saw Nero in dispaire of him selfe & of his estate, & that he was ready to flie into Egypt: he perswaded the gard they shoulde call Galba Emperour, as if Nero had not bene at ROME, but fled and gone, and promised euerie one seuen thousande sive hundred Drachmas a peece. And to the rest of the souldiers that were disperſed vp and downe in garriſon vpon the prouinces, twelue hundred & fifty Drachmas a man. For the leauing of which summe, they could not possiblie doe it, but they must needes commit tenne thousand times more extortion to euery bodie, then Nero had done. This large promise made them presently put Nero to death, and shortly after him, Galba him selfe also. For the souldiers forsooke Nero, for the hope they had to receiue this promised gift: and shortly after they slew the second, which was Galba, because they receiued not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards also, in seeking who should fill feede them with like gifts, before they could obtaine their wished hope, one of them destroyed another by treason and rebellion. But now to set downe all things particularlie which hapned at that time, it were to wryte one whole entere historie: and therefore, I will content my selfe, not to passe ouer with silence the notableſt deedes and lamentable calamities which happened at that time vnto the Cæsars.

It is manifestly knowne to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a priuate man, was the richest and wealthiest that came to be in the number of the Cæsars: who, though he came of a verie noble house, deriuing him selfe from the race and family of the Seruij, yet he was honored the more, because he was a kинne vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue and estimation, was one of the chiefest men of his time, albeit that otherwise, he willingly reined his authoritie and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was somwhat a kинne vnto Liuis, the wife of Augustus Cæsar, and therefore for her sake he came out of the Emperours pällace, when he went to take possession of his Consulshippe. Moreouer, it is reported, that when he had charge of the armie in Germanie, he did valliantlie behaue him selfe. And in the gouernment of LISIA also, where he was Viceconsul, he did as honorable behaue him selfe, as any man whatsoever. Howebeit his meane and simple ordinary of dyet, voyde of all excessse, was imputed misery & niggardlines in him, when he was proclaimed Emperour: because the praise of sober & temperate diet which he would haue brought in vs, was then so raw a thing, that it was taken for anew & strange deuise. He was sent Gouernor also into SPAYNE by Nero, before he had leamed to be afraid of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, besides that he was of a courteous & gentle nature, his age moreover increased the opinion they had of him, that he was timorous and feartfull. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vex & torment the prouinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to help them: yet was it some comfort to them, which were iudged & sold as slaues by the officers, to see that Galba did lament the miseries & calamities they endured, as if they had bene done vnto him selfe. So when any slanderous rymes were made against Nero, which were song vp and downe in euerie place: he would neither forbid them, nor yet was offended, as Neros officers were. Therefore he was marvellously beloued in the contrie, with them that were acquainted with him: because he was then in the eighty yere of his government as Proconsul amongst them, at which time Junius Vindex being Proprætor of GAULE, rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba before he entered into open action of rebellion. But Galba, did neither beleue him, nor also accuse & betray him, as diuers others which were gouernors of armies & prouinces did: who sent Vindex letters vnto Nero, which he him selfe had written vnto them, & so did as much as in them lay, to bind the enterprise, who afterwards being of the conspiracy did confesse they were traitors to them selves, as much as vnto him. Howebeit, when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed open warre against Nero, he wroote againe vnto Galba, & praied him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him and to become the head of a strong and mightie bodie (which were the GAVLES) that lacked A nothing but a head and Gouvernor, being a hundred thousand fighting men ready armed, and might also leaue a great number more of them. Then Galba consulted thereupon with his friends, & among them, some were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteration would grow at ROME vpon this sturle. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, said vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this so doubtful deliberation? Be not we wise men to call in question, whether we shall allowe of Vindex friendship, or accuse him? Yea, and with armes persecute him, that desired rather to haue thee Emperour, then Nero tyranne ouer the estate of ROME? Afterwardes Galba by bills set vp euerie where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchise such as would make sute for it. This rumor flying straight abroad, he gathered a great number of souldiers together, that were verie willing to rebell: and he was no sooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of state, but all the souldiers did salute him, by the name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this name at the first, but accusing Nero, and lamenting the deathes of the noblest men whome he had cruellie put to death: he promised that he would imploy his best wit and discreffion to the seruice and benefite of his contrie, neither naming him selfe Cæsar, nor Emperour, but only Lieutenant to the Senate, and state of ROME. Now, that Vindex did wiselie to call Galba to be Emperour, Nero him selfe in his doings doth witnesse it. Who hauing alwayes made a countenance as though he passed not for Vindex, & that he wayed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, he being the at supper, for spight he ouerthrew the table. Moreover, though the Senate had iudged Galba an enemy, yet Nero to be pleasaunt with his friends, made as though he was nothing affrayed of it, and said, this newes made all for him, because he stood in neede of money, & also that it was a happy occasion offered him to helpe him withall. For sayd he, we shall soone haue all the GAVLES goodes, as the spoyle of a iust warre, after we haue once againe ouercomen and conquered them: and moreover, Galbaes goods also would quickly be in his hands, that he might sell them, considering that he was become his open enemy. So he presently commaunded Galbaes goods should be openly sold, to them that would giue most. Galba vnderstanding that, did also by found of trompet tell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAYNE, and did also finde more men reader to buy, then there were goods to sell. Daily men rose against Nero in euery contry, who tooke Galbaes parte, Clodius Macer only excepted in AFRICK, and Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them D hauing charge of legions appointed for the safe keeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow seuerall directions by them selues, varying in minde & intent. For Clodius Macer hauing robbed much, & put diuers men also to death through his cruelty & couetousnes: he shewed plainly, that he swamme betwene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, nor yet kept it. Verginius also on the other side, being Generall ouer great & mighty legions, who had sundry times called him Emperour, & did in maner force him to take vpon him the name and Empire: he notwithstanding did euer answer them, that he neither minded to take the Empire vpon him, nor yet to suffer any other to do it, then such as the Senate should choofe and call vnto the same. This at the first somewhat amazed Galba. But when both the armies of Vindex and Verginius in spight of their Captaines (who could not stay nor keepe them backe, E no more then cochen can keepe backe the horse with their bridells) were ioyned in a great battell together, where were slaine twenty thousand GAVLES in the field, and Vindex also slue him selfe shortly after: it was geuen out, that the conquerors after so great a victory obtained, would copell Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperour, or else that they would take Neroes part againe. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perswaded him to ioyne with him, to hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMANES, & thereupon fled straight into a city of SPAYNE called *COLONIA, rather repeting him of that he had done, & wishing for his wonted peaceable & quiet life wherwith he was brought vp: then otherwise occupying him selfe about any necessary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterprise. Now it was about the beginning of sommer, and one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of F his slaves enfranchised, a SICILIAN borne, that was comen fro ROME in seven daies: who vnderstanding that Galba was alone, went presently to his chamber dore & opened it, & coming in

A in against the wils of the groomes of the chamber that stood at the dore, he told him that Nero being yet alieue, but sene no more, first the people of ROME, & then the Senate, had proclaimed him Emperour: & that immediately after, newes came that Nero was dead, the which he hardly beleuing notwithstanding, went thither him selfe, saw his body layed out vpon the ground, & then made towards him with all speede to bring him these newes. These newes maruelously reuiued Galba, and a multitude of men thronged straight about his dore, which began to be coragious, seing him liuely againe, although the speede of the Messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two dayes after, Titus also arriued, with certaine other of the campe, who told Galba perticularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalfe. So, this Titus was called to great honor, and the slave enfranchised had priuiledge giuen him to wear rings of gold, and he was B called Martianus Picellus, who afterwards of all the enfranchised bond men, became the chiefest man about his Master Galba. In the meane tyme, Nymphidius Sabinus began at ROME, not couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the absolute gouernment of the Empire, perswading him selfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought in a lytter vnto ROME, being at the least three score and thirteene yeare olde: besides also, that the army of the P R E T O R I A N S which were in ROME, did beare him good will of long tyme, and their acknowledged none other Lord but him onely, for the large promise he had made them, for the which he receiued the thanks, and Galba remained the debtor. So he presently commaunded Tigel- C linus, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the P R E T O R I A N S, to leaue of his sword: and disposing him selfe to banqueting and feasting, he sent for all those that had bene Consuls, Prætors, or Proconsuls of prouinces, and made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So there were certaine souldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they should doe well to send Ambassadors vnto Galba, to praye him that Nymphidius might be their onely D Capitaine still, without any companion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, and going dayly to visite him in his house, procuring him to be Author of all their decrees passed in Senate, and that he should authorize them: this made him hie minded, and the bolder by much, inasmuch that shortly after, they came to honor him in this sort, did not only hate and dislike his doings, but moreover he made them affrayd of him. Furthermore, when the Consuls had giuen to commo pursuants any commissions vnder seale, or letters patents signifying the decrees of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperour, by vertue of which letters patents, when the of- E ficers of the citie doe see the seale, they straight prouide the pursuants of coches and freshe horses to further their speede and hasty iorney: Nymphidius was very angrye with them; because they did not also come to him for his letters, sealed by him and his souldiers, to sende likewise vnto the Emperour. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to haue deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing them selues vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appease his anger. And to please the Commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meete withall. Amonge other, they slue a Fensler called Spicellus, whome they put vnder Neroes statues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie. Another also called Aponius, one of Neroes accusers, they threw him to the ground, and draue carts ouer him I laden with stones. And diuers others also, whom they slue in that manner: of the which, some had done no maner of offence. Hereupon one Mauricius, one of the noblest men of the citie & so esteemed, sayd openly in the Senate. I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being comen in manner to the fulnes of his hope: he was very glad to heare that some repnyed at him, because he was the sonne of Caius Cæsar, that was the next Emperour after Tiberius. For this Caius Cæsar, when he was a young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bene a fayer young woman, and the Daughter of one Calpurnius, one of Cæ- sars enfranchised bond men, whome he had gotten of a Laundres he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cæsar could knowe his mother, and men thought that he was begotten by a Fensler called Martianus, with whome his mother F Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in ROME, and in deede Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he confessed that he was the sonne of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascrib the glory of the death of Nero vnto him selfe; and thought him selfe not sufficiently recompensed with the honors they gaue him, neither also A with the goods he enioyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus whome Nero loued so dearly, whome he sent for to Neroes funeralls whilest his bodye was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppaeus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet secretly he aspyred to be Emperor, partly practising the matter in Rome it selfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were secretly his friends: and partly also through one Gellianus, whome he sent into SPAYNE, to see how all things went there.

Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, sauing Verginius Rufus only, who stood doubtfull yet, and made him sorely mistrust him, for that he was affrayd (besides that he was generall ouer a great and puissant army, hauing also newly ouerthrowen Vindex, and secretly ruling the best parte of the Empire of Rome, which was all GAULE, and then in tumult and vprore, ready to rebell) lest he would harken vnto them that perswaded him to take the Empire to him selfe. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that tyme so famous, and offo great estimation as Verginius, and that deservfully, for that he had done great seruice to the Empire of Rome in tyme of extremitie, hauing deliuered Rome at one selfe tyme from a cruell tyranny, and also from the daunger of the warres of the GAULES. This notwithstanding, Verginius persisting still in his first determination, referred the election of the Emperor vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly known, the common sort of souldiers were earnestly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the souldiers (otherwise called a Colonel of a thousand men) went into his tent with a sword drawn in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or els to looke to haue the sword thrust into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was sworne vnto Galba, and that he had receiued letters from Rome, aduertising him of the ordinance and decree of the Senate in the end, with much a doe, he perswaded the souldiers to proclayme Galba Emperor, who sent Flaccus Ordeonius to succcede him, vnto whome he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had deliuered vp his army vnto him, he went to meete with Galba, on whome he wayted, com-ming on still towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither shewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly esteemed of him, Galba him selfe being cause of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but specially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius, thinking to hinder his rising, did vnwittingly in deede further his good happe, and deliuered him occasion to draw him out of the ciuill warres and mischieues, (the which lighted afterwards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. D Furthermore, Ambassadors were sent from the Senate, and met with Galba at NARBONA, a ci-tie of GAULE: where after they had presented their humble duecie, they perswaded him to make all the haste he could possible to shew him selfe to the people of Rome, who were ma-rueulous desirous to see him. Galba receiued them very graciously and courteously, & made them great chere, howbeit very modestly notwithstanding. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had sent him diuers Officers, and store of Neroes moueables: yet he would neuer be serued with any of them, at any feasts or bankets he made, with other then his owne stuffe, wherein he shewed his noble mind, and how he could master all vanitie. But Titus Iunius shortly after told Galba, that this noble mind and ciuill moderation, without pride or pompe, was to lowly E a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine respect of honestie that knewe not it selfe, and became not his greatnes and maiestie. So, he perswaded him to vie Neroes moneye & stuffe, and to be sumptuous and princely in his feasts, without niggardlines. To conclude, the olde man Galba began plainly to shew that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who about all of them was extreme couetous, and besides too much giuen to women. For when he was a young man, the first time he went to the warres vnder Calpurnius Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good fellowshipp) disguised like a souldier into the campe, into his generalls tent (which the ROMANES called Principia) and there was somewhat bold with her.
Wherefore Calpurnius committed him to prison, but he escaped at his death. Another time, when he supped with Clodius Caesar, he stole a silver pot. Clodius hearing of it, bad him againe to F supper the next night: but he commaunded his men they should giue him drinke in an earthen cruse. Thus this theft (through Caesars pleasantnes) seemed rather a matter of sport, then

The condition of Titus Iunius.

A of anger: howbeit the faultes which he committed afterwards through extreame couetousnes of moneye, (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the waye about him) gaue vnto some iust cause, and vnto others apparant culler of tragical mischieues, and greuous calamities.
For Nymphidius, so soone as Gellianus was returned out of SPAYNE, whome he had sent thither to see what Galba did: he enforming him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the gard and house of the Emperor, and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could neuer be suffred to come neare Galba, nor to speake with him a part, because those which were about Galba did mistrust him, & euer had an eye to him to see what he did, he was maruelously perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and petty Captaines of the campe of the PRÆTORIAN army, and perswaded them that Galba touching his owne B person, was a good old and discreete man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne aduise & counsel, but was ruled altogether by Iunius and Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good before they came to be of greater power, and to haue such great authoritie in ma-neging the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before, to send Ambassadors to the Emperor in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcome vnto Rome, and to all men els besides. The Captaines vtterly misliked this deuse. For they thought it too strange, and beyond all reason, to seeme to teache an old Emperor, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: & to appoynt him what seruants and friends he should keepe, and whome he should trust or mistrust. Nymphidius perceiuing this, tooke another course, and wrote letters vnto Galba to ter-C rifie him, one tyme sending him word that he was maruelous euill beloued of many in Rome, and that they were ready to rebell against him: an other tyme also, that the legions of GER- MANY were reuolted, and that he vnderstoode the like from the legions in LYRY and SYRIA.
And another tyme also, that Clodius Macer in AFRICK stayed all the shippes freighted with corne that were bound for Rome. But in the ende, finding that Galba made no accompt of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings: he determined first of all to set vp-on him. Howbeit Clodius Celsus, borne in the cite of ANTIOCH, a wise man, and his faithfull friend, dissuaded him maruelously not to doe it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in Rome that would call Nymphidius, Cæsar. Howbeit in contrary D manner, diuers others mocked Galba and specially one Mithridates of the Realme of PONT, that sayd he was a bald writhen man. For the ROMANES (sayd he) haue him in deede now in some estimation, but when they haue once seene him, they will thinke it a perpetual shame and reproche to our tyme, that he was called Cæsar. So they thought it good to bring Nym- phidius about midnight into the campe, and there openly to proclayme him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the souldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his souldiers together in the night, and before them all did first openly reprove him selfe, and then them, for that they had lo often turned and changed in so short time, without any wit or discretion, hauing no iudgement to chuse the best way, but to be pricked forward and caried headlong in that sort by some wicked spirit, which brought them out of one treason into another. And yet (sayd he) our first change had some countenance of reason, to wete, the horrible vices E and faultes of Nero: but now, wherein can we accuse Galba, to haue any countenance to falsifie our faith vnto him? hath he slayne his mother: hath he put her to death? hath he shamefully played the tumbler or common player vpon a scaffold in the Theater? And yet for all these vile parts, we neuer durst once beginneto forsake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius's words, who told vs that Nero had first forsaken vs, and that he was fled into EGYPT. What shall we doe? Shall we kill Galba after Nero? what, shall we kill him that is a kinne to Livia, to make the sonne of Nymphidius Emperor: as we haue already slayne the sonne of Agrippina? Or shall we rather kill him that hath rashly entred into this enterprise, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to shewe our selues faithfull souldiers vnto Galba? All the souldiers yielded straight to the Colonells words, and therewith went to their other companions to perswade F them to keepe their faith & promise they auowed vnto the Emperor: so that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noyse and cryes beeing great, tymes to quenchethis tumult, to staye such as were yet wauering: he went thither him selfe A with great store of torche light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Cicero Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without booke to speake vnto the souldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe shut, and saw diuers men armed vpon the walls, he began to be affrayd: and comming nearer, asked them what they ment by it, and by whose commaundement they had armed them selues as they did. Answer was made him by them all, that they did acknowledge no other Emperour but Galba: the which he seemed to like of, and also commaunded them that followed him to doe the like, and therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certaine of the souldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and suffred him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit alsoone as he was comen in, first there was a dart throwen at him, the which one Septimius that went before him receiued vpon his shield, & then others also came with their swords drawn in their hands to set on him, and followed him as he fled into a souldiers cabbone, where they slue him. Then they layed his body in an open place, and rayled it about, that euery man that would, might the next day see it. So Nymphidius being slayne in this fort, Galba vnderstanding of his death, commaunded that all Nymphidius friendes and confederators that had not bene slayne at that tyme, should for his sake be put to death, as in deede they were. Amongest them they slue Cicero that had made the oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates also of PONT. Howbeit, though in deede they had deserued it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to commaund these men to be put to death in that fort, which were men of such qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of lawe. For euery man stood in good hope vpon the comming in of this new Emperour, to haue seene another manner of gouernment, then they had yet seene: howbeit they were deceiued of their hope at the first choppe. But yet they misliked this most of all, when he commaunded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had bene Consul, because he was Neroes faithfull friend. But nowe for the death of Clodius Macer, whome Trebucianus slue in AFRICA by his commaundement, and for Foncius that was also slayne in GERMANY by Valens: he had some reason to feare them, because they were in armes, and commaunded great armies. But for Tertullianus that was an olde man, naked, and vnarmed: truly he should haue put him to his triall by law, if he would haue ministred iustice, the which he promised to keepe at his first comming to the Imperial crowne. Herein they greatly reprobued Galba. Now, when he drew neare to ROME within fise and twenty furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of Maryners and sea faring men, that kept the high way on euery side, wandering vp and downe in euery place. These were the men whome Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the ower and made them souldiers. So they were come thither to be suters to him; that he would allow them fill to be souldiers, and they pressed so arrogantly vpon him, that they would not suffer those which came to the newe Emperour, to see him, nor speake with him: but they fell to tumult and vprere, crying out to haue ensignes for their legion, and to be appoynted a place to lye in in garrison. Galba referred them ouer to another tyme, and bad them they should then let him vnderstand their demand. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereupon fell to plaine mutinie, & followed him with great cries: in fomuch that some of them stuck not to draw out their swords. E Then Galba commaunded the horsemen he had about him, to set vpon them. So there was not a man of them that resisted, but some of them were ouerthrowen, and troden vnder their horse feete: & others also slaine as they fled. This was a very euil signe and preface for him, to enter into ROME with such bloudshed, vpon so many poore mens dead bodies as lay slayne on the ground. Howbeit, where some before did despise and mock him for an old & feeble man, euery man then was affraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, because he would shew a great change and alteration from the vnreasonable vaine gifts and expenses of Nero: it seemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Cannus, an excellent player on the recorder, had played all supper tyme, because it was a maruelous sweete Musick to heare: he prayd & commaunded it maruelously, and commaunded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he tooke a few crownes, & put them into his hand, saying, that it was not money of the common treasure, but of his owne. Furthermore, he gaue straight commaundement that they should

of Galba.

A should require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had geuen, and bestowed vpon common players, minstrells, wrestlers, and people of such kinde of facultie and profession, and to leaue them only the tenth parte, But he got litle by this deuse. For the most parte of those that had giftes geuen them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that liue without any rule or order, and spent at night that which they get in the day: and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them to restore it againe. But this was an endles worke, for things had bene conveyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinite number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonor returned to Galba him selfe, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour straight laced to all others, whilest he him selfe tooke vnreasonably of all men, making portefalse of euerie thing that came to hand. For Hesiodus the Poet sayth:

As well when the vessell is full that it is fill, As when it is emptie, thirst craueth drinke still.

Hesiodus saying.

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be olde and feeble, would wisely take his fortune and time, while time serued, supposing it almost to be at an end, so soone as he beganne to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much dishonor the poore old man, ouer greatlie abusing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindering those, the which the Prince him selfe had a good desire to deale vprightly in, as to punish the officers of Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobinus: whereat the people maruelously reioiced, and cried out as they went to execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and blessed procession, and required Tigellinus of the goddes and men, that had bene chiefe maister and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trimme man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, & had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of his wicked parts he played, when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthe of death, & that afterwards had also betrayed him: he was left alone, & nothing sayd vnto him, being a manifest prooffe to all others, that they should not dout to hope to obtaine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, so they fed him with gifts. For the common people of ROME neuer desired thing so much, as to see Tigellinus to be caried to execution: and they neuer left crying out to demand him in all assemblies of the Theater or shew place, vntil such time as the Emperour Galba did forbid them by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, because he was sicke of a consumption of the lungs, which by litle & litle did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloodie. The people were much offended with this, but yet they seemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did sacrifice to the goddes for his health & safetie, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rising from supper, being set by the Emperour, went vnto Tigellinus to be merie with him, and tooke his daughter being a widow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her a gift of fise and twentie Myriades of siluer: and commaunded one of his chiefest concubines to take a carcanet from her necke she wore, and to geue it the other, being worth fiftene Myriades. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with iustice, were reprobued and taken in euill part: as the thing that was graunted to the GAVLES, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies & taxes they were wont to pay, and that they were made free of ROME, so much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the souldiers still liued in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promised them, they should yet enioy as much as Nero had geuen them. But Galba vnderstanding that they complained of him, he spake a word meete for so noble and worthe a Prince as he was: that he v-F sed to choole souldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the souldiers, it bred a maruelous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not only to take the gift away from them which they hoped presently to haue receiued, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperours that should come after him, what they should doe. Howbeit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian gard at ROME appeared not yet, but was secretlie kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maiestie and person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, bicause they sawe as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did somwhat smother and keepe in the shew of their wicked intent. But they which had before serued vnder Verginius, and were at that time vnder Flaccus in GERMANIE, thinking them selues worthie of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and hauing nothing geuen them in recompence: they would not bepleased with any thing their Capitaine sayd vnto them, neither did they make any accompt of Flaccus, bicause he coule not sturre himselfe, he was so plagued with the gowte, and besides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sportes were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonells and Captaines (according to the maner of the ROMANES) made prayers vnto the goddes for the health and prosperitie of the Emperour Galba: there were diuers of them that made a noyse at the first, and afterwarde when the Captaines continued on their prayers, in the end the souldiers answered, if he be worthie. The legions in like maner vnder Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vsue such insolent partes: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertise him by letters. Wherefore Galba being affrayed, & mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also bicause he had no children: he determined to adopt some young gentleman for his sonne, of the noblest house of the cite of ROME, and to proclaim him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but euer geuen to sensualitye and pleasure from his cradell, as much as any ROMANE could be. And as Homer oftentimes doth call Parris, the husbande of the fayer Helen, naming him by the name of his wife, bicause he had no other commendable vertue in him: euen so Otho came to be knownen in ROME, by marrying Poppæa, whome Nero loued when she was Crispinus wife, howbeit bearing some respect to his wife, and being affrayed also of his mother, he had intised Otho to be his bawde vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearly, and muche delighted in his companie, bicause he was so good a fellow and free of his fleshe: and was verie glad sometime to heare howe he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was noyting him selfe with pretious oyles and perfumes, he cast a litle vpon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feast in his house, where sodainlie were thrust into the hall, diuers vessells of gold and siluer full of this perfumed oyle, that ranne out of them like conduit water, and did wette all the hall. So Otho hauing first possessed Poppæa, and abused her vnder hope of Neroes loue: he perswaded her to be diuorced from her husband. The which she did, and he receiued her home to his owne house, as his lawfull wife: not being so well pleased to haue parte, as he was sorie and angrie also to let an other enioy her. Now Poppæa her selfe (as it is reported) did not mislike this his gealouzie, for sometimes the woulde shut her dore against Nero, though Otho were not within: either bicause he would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue liking still, or else as some thought, bicause he would not haue Cæsar to her husbande, and likewise that he would not refuse him for her friend, bicause she was wantonly geuen. But for it is, Otho was in daunger of his life by marrying of Poppæa: and so was it also a strange thing, that Nero hauing put his wife and sister to death, only to mary Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, and saued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes sake that was his frende, through whose perswasion he was sent to the furthest parte of SPAYNE alongest the Ocean sea, to be Gouvernour of LVSIANIA. And there he gouerned so wisely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troublefome vnto the contry: knowing that this honorable charge was geuen him, only to mitigate and hide his banishment. Afterwarde when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Gouvernours of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both gold and siluer, vnto the mynt maister, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and so to be conuerted into currant coyne. Moreover he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to serue a Prince: and otherwise, when he was tried, he shewed him selfe as faithfull and skilfull in matters of state, as any one that followed the Emperours traine. Insomuch as all the way he went many dayes iorney in coach with Galba him selfe, and did maruelouslie currie fauour with Titus Iunius, bestowing great gifts vpon him, and also entreteining him with plea-

A first species: but specially, bicause he willingly gaue him the vpper hād whereby he was assured to be the second person in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Iunius, for that he graited mens lures frackly & freely without one penny taking, & was betides easy to be spoke with of euery man that had any sute to him: but specially of the souldiers, whom he did greatly help & further, & caused diuers also to be called to honorable office, he himselfe partly mouing the Emperour for the, without any labor or sute, made vnto him, & partly also obteining the at Iunius hāds, & of the two infrachifted bondme of Galba, Seclus & Aspasius. For, these three men did beare all the sway & credit about the Emperour in the court. Moreover, alwaies when he intised the Emperour to his house, he bribed the Prætorian gard that waited vpon him, & gaue euery souldier a crown. Now this in sight, seemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperour with.

B though in deede it was a fine deuise to ouerthrow him, to bribe the souldiers in that sort as he did. So Galba consulting whom he should make his successor: T. Iunius preferred Otho vnto him, the which he did not simply of himselfe, nor without reward, but only with promise that Otho should marry his daughter if Galba did adopt him his sonne, & proclaim him successor in the Empire. Howbeit Galba did alway specially regard the common wealth before his priuat liking, & sought to adopt such a one, as should not so much please himselfe, as otherwise he should be profittable & meete for the Empire. But surely in my opinion, Galba would not make Otho his heire of his goods, considering what an vnreasonable speeder he was, & how sumptuous in all his things, & besides, far gone in det for he ought aboute fise thousand Myriades. So when he had heard Iunius coucell about this adoptiō, he gely without other answer, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, & made Otho only Cōsul at that time, & T. Iunius Cōsul with him, whereby it was straight supposed, that at the beginning of the new yere, he would proclaim him his successor in the Empire. Which was the thing the souldiers most desired of all other. But now, delaying still his determination, the legions of the ROMANES in GERMANIE, did rise & rebel against him al at an instant. For he was generally hated of all his souldiers, bicause he paid the not the gift he had promised them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alleged for their cause of rising, that he had dishonorably reiected Verginius Rufus: and that the GAULES which had fought against the, were rewarded with great & rich priuileges, & they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grievously punished & put to death. Moreover, that Galba did only honor Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his goodwill vnto him,

D offering publike oblatiōs & funeral sacrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperour. Now such speches & rumors ran through the cape amongst the, whē the first day of the yere came, which the ROMANES call the calends of Ianuary, on which day whē Flaccus had called the souldiers together, to sweare them to the Emperour according to the custome: they plucked down Galbaes images, & sware only in the name of the people, & the Senate of ROMANE. The captaines seeing what course they tooke, were as much afraid of the daunger to be without a head, as they stood doubtful of the mischief of their rebellio. So there stept vpon one amongst the & said, My fellows in armes, what do we meane? We neither choose any other Emperour, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperour at this present: whereby we shew plainly, that we do not only refuse Galba, but also all other to be our head & Emperour that may commaund vs. Now for Flaccus Ordeinens, that is but Galbaes shadow and image: I would wish we should let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, gouernour of the lower GERMANIE, he is not farre from vs, but one daies iorney only, whose father was Censor at ROMANE, and thrise also Cōsul, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Cæsar in the gouernment of the Empire: whose pouerty if any man mislike in him, is a manifest prooffe of his goodnes and magnanimity. Him therefore let vs choofe, & let the world know that we can tell how to choofe an Emperour, better then the SPANYARDS or LVSIANIANS. Some of the souldiers that stood by, confirmed these words, but others also misliked of the inlomuch that amōg the rest there was an ensigne bearer that stole secretly out of the cape, to cary Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great supper, & had great store of good cōpany with him. These newes rūning straight through his cape, Fabius Vales, colonel of a legiō, came the next morning with a great nūber of horseme, & was the first mā that named Vitellius Emperour, who before seemed to refuse that name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of so great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine & meate, he came out among the, & accepted the name of Germanicus which they gave him, & refused the name of Caesar. But therewithall incōtinently after, Flaccus souldiers, leaving their goodly popular oth which they had sworn in the name of the people & Senate, they all then tooke their othes faithfully to doe what it should please the Emperour Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was chosen Emperour in Germany. So Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time any longer for the adoption he had intended, wherefore certainly vnderstanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Delabella, & the most part of the with Otho, he neither liking the one nor the other, lodainly without any word spake to any man, he sent for Piso, (that was the younger sonne of Craffus & Piso, whom Nero had put to death) a young man faire conditioned, & shewed by his graue & modest countenance he had by nature, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe presently fro his pallace, & went straight to the cape to proclaim Piso Caesar, & his succesor in the Empire. Howbeit at his setting out of his pallace, there appeared many great signes in the firmament which followed him. And moreover, when he was also come into his cape, & that he began to say without booke part of his oratio, & partly also to read it lightened all the while he spake, & there fel such a great shower of raine vpon it, & a maruelous thick mist in the cape, & ouer all the city, that mē might easily se the gods did not like this adoption, & that it would not prosper. The souldiers the felues shewed their discontentment by their heauy looks, & the rather, because at that time there was no spech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were present also, maruelled much for that they could gather by the countenance & words of Piso that Piso nothing reioiced at this great fauor, although he lacked not wit & vnderstanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also, they found easely by Otho's looks, many signes & proofes that he was maruelously offended in his mind, to see that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the mā that was first spokē of, & thought most worthwhile of all other, & being come also to nere vnto in now to see himselfe thus wiped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine prooffe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his hart, so that after that time he fell stood in feare of his life. For he being afraid of Piso, having also Galba, & being grieuouly offended with T. Iunius, he wēt his way full of diuers thoughts in his mind. For the Soothsayers, Astronomers, & Chaldeans which he euer kept about him, they did perswade him not to be discouraged for this, & to cast all hope aside; but specially one Protoner, in whom he had great confidence, because he had oftentimes before foretold and assured him, that Nero should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, & he himselfe suruiue him, & should become Emperour of Rome. Whereby Protoner hauing proued his first prediction true vnto him, he had him be bold, & feare not that to come. But now besides him, those that secretly complained vnto him, did prick him forward the more, sighing to see him so euil delt with by Galba, & diuers of the chiefly, which bare great authority & credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius who being the cast off, & discountenanced, came all vnto him, & stirred him vp the more. As amongst others, Veturius & Barburius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Othio, and the other Tesserarius: (for so the Romans call those that be their messengers, spials, & officers to the Captaines) who with an infranchised bondman of his called Onomastus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted some souldiers with ready money, & other some with faire words, being of them felues euil inclined, & expected but occasion to vtter their malice. For otherwise, had the souldiers bene all of one mind, it had not bene an enterprize to haue bene brought to passe in foure dayes space (being no more betwixt the adoption and murder) to make a whole campe rebell in that sorte. For they were slaine the fifteenth day of Ianuarie, on which day Galba did sacrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his frends. But at that time the Soothsayer called Ombrius, when he had the intralls of the beastes sacrificed in his hands, & had looked vpon them: he spake not doutfully, but plainly, that he saw signes of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour was in present danger of great treason. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the goddes had put Galba into Otho's hands: for he stood at that time behind Galba, & both heard & saw all that the Soothsayer did. So he seeming to be grieued withall in his minde, and his colour changing oft for the feare he was in: his infranchised bondeman Onomastus came and tolde him that the mafons and chiefe

A chiefe carpenters were come to speake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch word agreed vpon betwene them, at which tyme Otho should then goe vnto the souldiers. Then Otho sayd, that he went to looke to an olde house he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would shewe it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the market place, where the golden pillar standeth, where also the greatest high wayes of all ITALIE doe meete together. There certaine met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all about three & twentie persons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vncontent as it appeared, notwithstanding he was so fine and effeminate a man, but rather resolute and stout in instant danger: yet feare so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterprize. Howbeit the souldiers would not suffer him, but compassing his litter rounde about with their armes, and their swords drawne in their hands, they commaunded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went hastening on his driuers, he often muttered to him selfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwise troubled, to see such a small nūber of men about him, that they durst venter vpon so hard an enterprize. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three & by foure in a company: all the which came and ioyned with him, & cried Caesar, Caesar, having their swords drawn in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to gard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracy, but being amazed and affraied with their loudaine comming, he suffred them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he found no man that resisted him. For they that knew nothing of the practise, being compassed in with those that were made priuy to it, & had known it of long time: being found straggling here and there, by one & by two, they followed the rest for feare at the first, & afterwards for good will. This was brought straight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothsayer being yet busie about his sacrifice: inso much that they which before gaue no credit to those diuinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly signe. Then there ran immediately a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Therupon Iunius & Lacon, & certaine other of Galba's infranchised bondmen, stoode to gard Galba's person with their swordes drawn in their hāds. Piso also went out to speake vnto the souldiers that garded the Emperours person. Moreover, because the ILLYRIAN legion lay out of the campe in a place called Vipsantus: they dispatched away Marius Celsus with all speed, a very honest man, to get that place. Galba in the meane time stood in doubt whether he should come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him goe, but Celsus and Lacon perswaded him to go out. Inso much as they fell at great words with Iunius, that went about to dissuade him from it. In this flurre, there ranne a rumor that Otho was slaine in the field. Immediately after came Tubius Atticus, one of the noblest souldiers of all the Emperours gard, & shewed his sword drawn, crying that he had slaine Caesar's enemy: and thrust through the prease, and got to Galba, and shewed him his sword bloodied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commaunded him to doe it. The souldier answered him: the faith & othe he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that stoode by cried out it was nobly done of him, & clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to doe sacrifice to Iupiter, and also to shew him selfe openly: Howbeit he was no soner come into the market place, but he heard contrarie newes, that Otho was Lord and Maister of the whole campe, and armie. Then, as it happeneth in so great a prease of people, some cried out to him to returne backe againe, others would haue him to goe forward: others had him be affrayed of nothing, and others willed him to looke to him selfe. So his litter being thus turnoyled to and fro, as toft vpon the sea, sometime borne backe, other while caried forward: first of all they saw certaine horsemen, and then footemen also armed, comming from Paulus pallace, all of them together crying out with loud voice, hence, hence, priuat man. Then all the people set vpon a running, not flying disperedly, but in heapes vpon porches and stalls in the market place, as it had bene to haue seene some fight or sport. Then one called Attilius * Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open warres. Others rounde about threwe darts on euerie side of him against his litter. But when they sawe they could not kill him, then they came neerer to his litter with their swords drawn in their hands; and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defende him, sauing one man onely, whom the Sunne sawe that day, amongst so many throw-fands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He hauing receiued priuately no manner of pleasure at Galbaes handes, but only to discharge his othe and duetie: stepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine braunche he had in his hand (with which the ROMANE Capitaines doe vse to beate their souldiers that haue offended) he fell out with them that did fet vpon him, and prayed them to holde their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the ende when he saw they would not leaue, but that they fell to it in good earnest: he then drew his sword, and bare of the blowes as well as he could, vntill they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being ouerthrowen right in the place called Curuius lake: Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traitorous souldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wounde: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bad them strike hardily, if it were to do their contrie good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighes, as it is reported: howbeit the souldier that slue him, was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others doe reporte that it was one Terentius, other also say Arcadius. And some other doe call him Fabius Fabulus: who hauing striken of his head, wrapped it in the lappe of his gowne, because he could not otherwise take holde of it, for that he was all balde. Howbeit his fellowes and confortes would not suffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done should be seene. Therefore he set it vpon the point of his launce, and so shaking the face of this poore olde man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bishoppe, and Confull) he ranne vp and downe (like madde women possessed with the spirite and furie of Bacchus at the feastes of Bacchus) bowing downe his launce being all of a goare blood. When his head was brought to Otho, it is sayd he cried out aloud: tuth, my fellowes, this is nothing: vnlesse you bring me also Pisoes head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who slue him hard by the temple of Vesta. So did they also kill Titus Iunius: who openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracie against Galba, and cried out to them that slue him, that Otho did not know they did kill him. This notwithstanding, the souldiers strake of his head, and Lacois also, and brought them both to Otho to receiue the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus sayth:

Of seven peradventure slaine dead on the ground, A thovrusd and vntill say, that they all gaue the vround.

So there were diuers men at that time, who being no partakers of this murder, had bloodied all their handes and swordes, and so shewed them bloodied to haue rewarde also: but Vitellius notwithstanding made inquirie of them afterwarde, and caused them to be put to death. There came into the fiedle also, one Marinus Celsus, whome diuers men accused to haue perswaded the souldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bad he shoulde be put to death. Howbeit Otho would not suffer them to kill him: and yet being afraied to contrarie the souldiers mindes, he tolde them they shoul not kill him so rashly, because he was first to learne some thinges more of him. So he commaunded them to binde him, and deliuered him to be kept of those he trusted most. Afterwards, the Senate were presentlie assembled: who, as if men had bene sodainlie chaunged from them they were, or as if there had bene new goddes, they all sware by the name of Otho, (the which othe he him selfe had before sworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him besides, Augustus, and Cesar, the bodies of them that were slaine lying yet headles on the ground in the market place, all in their Confull robes. And as for their heades, the souldiers after they could tell no more what to doe with them, they folde the heade of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the summe of two thousande five hundred Drachmas. And for Pisoes head, his wife through in-treatie, begged it of one called Veranius. On the other side, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobis and Vitellius seruantes: who, after they had vled it as vilelie as they coulde, deuise, they threwe it at length in a place, where their bodies are cast, whome the Cesars put to death, the which they call Sestertium. Nowe for his bodie, Heluidius Priscus, through Ochoes sufferance, caried it away, and Argius, one of his infranchised bondmen, buried it by night.

Thus

A Thus haue you heard the historie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth was inferior to few ROMANES, and in them both was the chieffest man of all his time, and had alway liued in honorable fame and estimation, in the raigne of fise Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him: and not through his owne force and power. For of them that stroue to make them felues Emperours at that time, some found no man that thought them worthe of it: others did put forth them felues, as thinking them felues worthe of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vsing his name against Vindex boldnesse: whereby he procured, that his rising (which before was called innouation and rebellion) was then called ciuill warre, after that his faction came to haue a man to be their head; thought worthe to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not so muche desire to be Emperour for him selfe, as to doe good to his contrie and common wealth. But yet he erred, in seeking to commaunde the souldiers whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had spoyle by their flatteries: euen as in olde time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did commaunde the souldiers of the Empire of Rome at that time. So he being now a vetie olde man, shewed him selfe a good Emperour and after the old sorte, in his behauiour towards the souldiers only: but in all other things else, being caried away with the couetousnes of T. Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchised bondmen, he left none desirous to be gouerned by him, but many that were forie for his death.

THE LIFE OF Otho.

THE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Capitoll, and sacrificed, and there sent for Marinus Celsus to come vnto him, whom he curteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marinus Celsus made him a wife and noble aunswere againe, and sayd that the matter for the which they would haue accused him vnto him, did witnes his behauiour, shewing him selfe faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleasure. Thele words of them both did maruelouslie please the people: & so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well. Moreouer, after he had verie fauorable and gracioulie taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Consul, he employed partly about Verminus Rufus, and did also establish them Consuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honored the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation with certaine Priesthoodes. Besides all this, he restored vnto all those Senators that were banished by Nero, and called home againe, all their goodes yet vnfold. Whereupon the chiefe Magistrates and noble men of the citie that quaked before for feare, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a deuill or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour: they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling and gracious taigne they were so lately entred into. Moreover, nothing pleased all the Romans together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men so muche, as that he did vnto Tigellus. For it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment euerie man threatened him withall, as a thing due to the commonwealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the noble men thought his vnreasonable insolency and lust of the flesh, (following naughtie packes, and common strumpets, burning still in filthie concupiscence) an extreame punishment, comparable to many deaths, and being also no better then a dead man in maner, still following pleasure and sensualitye as long as he coulde: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they shoulde see suche a wicked creature as he liue, that had put so many noble men to death. So Otho sent for him, who liued verie pleasauntlie at his houses in the contrie, by the citie of Sinessa, and had shippes euere ready vpon the sea coast, to fite if necessitie draue him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money, which was sent with commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him scape; but when he saw he could not frame him to his minde, yet he refrayned not to geue him gifts, and prayed him to geue him leaue to shauie his beard. The other graunted him. Then Tigellus tooke a razor, and did cut his owne throte. So Otho hauing pleased the people thus well, he sought not otherwise to be reuenged of his priuate injuries. Moreover, to currie fauour with the common people, he refused not to be called Nero, in any open assemblies at the Theaters. Also when certaine priuate men had set vp Neros images in open sight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreover Clodius Rufus writeth, that letters patents & commissions were sent into Spain by posts, subscribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit when it came to his eares that the noble men of Rome misliked of it, he left it off, and would wryte it no more in his letters. So Otho hauing begonne in this sorte to stablish his Empire, the souldiers maruelouslie troubled him. For they continually perswaded him to take heede to him selfe, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neere vnto him: the which they did, either for that in deede they bearing him good will, were affrayed some trecherie or treason would be secretlie practised against him: or else it was some fained deuise to set all together by the eares, and to bring it to ciuill warre. For when Otho him selfe had sent Crispinus with his seuenteenth legion to bring him certaine prisoners, and that Crispinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commission, hauing laden carts with armor and weapon for his souldiers: the desperatest and boldest men among them, began to crie out, and sayd that Crispinus ment no good in his hart, and that the Senate went about to make some change and sturre, and that his armor and weapons were not for Cesar, but against him. These wordes moued many mens consciences, and made them to rebell: so that some layed hold vpon the carts to stay them, others slue two Centurions out of hande, and Crispinus him selfe also that would haue stayed them. Thereupon all of them together, one incoring another, went directly to Rome, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, vnderstanding that there were foure score Senators at supper with the Emperour, they ranne straight to the pallace, crying out that it was a good occasion offered them to kill all Casars enemies at a clappe. Hereupon all Rome was straight in armes, looking immediately after to be sacked and spoyled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho him selfe also being in great feare and distresse. For men might easelie see he was affrayed, because of his ghesstes he had bidden, not for him selfe, seeing them all amazed with the matter for feare, not speaking a word vnto him, but staring on him still, and speciallie those that came and brought their wiues with them to supper.

So

A So Otho sodainly sent the Capitaines vnto the souldiers & commaunded them to speake with them, & to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the borde, and conueyed his ghesstes out of his pallace by secret posternes. So they saued them selues, passing through the souldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Casars enemies. So the Emperour rising from his bedde, he pacified them with gentle wordes, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he sent them all away. The next morning he liberallie bestowed vpon euery souldier, a shewlande two hundred and fiftie Drachmas: and then he went into the market place, & there gaue great commendation to the common people for their readie good will they had shewed vnto him: howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vnder colour B and pretex of honestie, did commit many lewde partes, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be euill spoken of, and their constancie and faith also to be misliked of, and prayed them his grieft might be theirs, and that the offenders might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him alowde he should doe it. So Otho thereupon caused two of them only to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatlie offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, marueled much to see this change. Other were of opinion, that it stoode him vpon to doe so, to winne the souldiers harts, because of the warre at hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all partes, that Vitellius had taken vpon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one in an others necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to submit them selues vnto Vitellius. Others tolde him also, how the legions remayning in Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Mysia, had chosen Otho. Immediately after, frendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Vespasianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Iudea, with great and mightie armies. Whereupon Otho geuing credit vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he meddled with any deeper enterprise, then became a priuate souldier: and that he would geue him golde and siluer enough, and a great citie, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleasure. Vitellius gently answered him at the first, and sported with him: but afterwards they falling out one with another, spitefull letters were sent betwixt either parties, one of them reproaching an other, not falsly but fondly, and foolishly detecting eche others vices. For in deede it was hard to iudge, which of them two was most licentiouslie geuen, most D effeminate, least skilfull, poorer, or most indetted before. Nowe at that time they talked of wonderful signes that had bene sene: howbeit they were but flying tales, & there was no man to iustifie them. But in the Capitoll there was the image of Victorie set vpon a triumphing chariot: the which euery bodie saw did let slacke the reynes of the bridles of the hories which she had in her handes, as though she could not stay them any more. The statue of Caius Cesar also within the lland, which standeth in the middelt of the riuer of Tiber at Rome, without any earthquake or storme of winde, turned of it selfe from the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chaunced about the time that Vespasian began to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many also tooke the ouerflowing of the riuer of Tiber for an euill signe. For in deede it was at that time of the yeare when riuers do swell most, yet was it neuer so great before, neither had E it euer done so much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerflown her bankes, and drowned the most parte of the citie, and specially the corne market: in somuche that they suffered famine many dayes after in Rome. In all this sturre, newes came that Cecinna and Valens, (two of Vitellius Capitaines) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreover in Rome, Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Praetorian souldiers, that he practised some treason. Now Otho, either because he was affrayed of him, or of some other: he sent him to the citie of Aquinum, promising him he shoulde haue no other hurte. Then choosing the choycest gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, and did not deprime him of any ioy of his honor and dignitie. Moreover, he was verie carefull to see his wife and mother safe, that they shoulde not be affrayed of them selues. Besides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Vespasians brother, Governour of Rome in his absence: and did it for Neros sake, who had afore geuen him the same honor and authoritie the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Vespasian see, that he loued & trusted him.

So he tarried behinde at BRESILL, a cite standing vpon the riuer of Po: and sent his armie before vnder the conduct of Marius Celsus, of Suuetonius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great personages, howbeit they could not haue their wills to rule the armie as they woulde, bicause of the insolencie and stubbornes of the souldiers, who would haue no other Captaines but the Emperour only, saying that he, and none other, should command them. In deede, the enemies souldiers alio were not muche wiser, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and lustie vpon the selfe same occasion: howbeit they had this aduantage ouer the other, that they could tell how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardnes, and neuer thronge from it. Whereas the Prætorian souldiers that came from ROME, were fine mealed mouthed men, bicause they had bene long from the warres, & had liued at ease in ROME, and taken their pleasure in banketing & playes: and therefore in a brauery and idoly, they would needes haue men thinke that they did dained to do what their Captaines commaunded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that when Spurina would haue compelled them, he was in daunger of death, and escaped verie narrowly that they slue him not. For they thucke not to reuile him, and geue him as fowle words as they could: calling him traitor, and cursing him, saying that he married all Cæsars affaires. Yea and there were some of them that hauing their full cuppes went in the night to his tent, to aske him leaue to depart, saying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flowte they had geuen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the city of PLACENTIA, did stand Spurina and his affaires to great purpose. For Vitellius souldiers coming hard to the walls of the cite, did mocke Orhoes men that were at the cranewes of the same, and called them fine daunsers, and goodly stage players, that had scene nothing but playes and feasts: and that for feats of armes, and battells, they knewe not what it meant: and that the greatest aife they euer did, was for that they strake of the head of a poore naked olde man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the fild before men, their hartes were in their heeles. These vile words gallied them to the hart, and made them so mad withall, that they came of them selues to pray Spurina to commaund them what he thought good, promising that from thence forth they would neuer refuse any paines or daunger he would put them to. Thereupon, there was a hotte assault geuen to the city of PLACENTIA, with great store of sundry engines. Howbeit Spurinaes men had the better, and hauing with great slaughter repulled the assailants, they faued one of the goodliest, the greatest, and most flourishing cities of all ITALIE. So Orhoes Captaines were farre more familiar, courteous, and ciuill to deale with cities and priuate men, then Vitellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna, was neither for person nor maners accompanyable for the people, but strange, monstrous, & troublesome to see him only, a mightie made man wearing gallie gaskons, and coates with fleues, after the facion of the GAYLES, and spake in this attire vnder the ensigne bearers, and Captaines of the ROMANES. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted a horsebacke, gallantlike apparelled, and accompanied with a troupe of the choycest men of armes of all the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was so couetous, that no spoyle of enemies, no polling of subiects, nor bribes taken of their friends and confederats, could quenche or satisfie his vnstatiable couetousnes: whereby it seemeth that this was the let, that coming on so slowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much haile, for the desire he had to haue the only honor of the victory to him selfe: & this was the cause, that besides his other light fautes, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and season, and when it came to the poynt in deede, yet he fought it not out valiantly, so that he had almost cast all away. For when he had the repulse from PLACENTIA, he went vnto CREMONA an other great cite. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was besieged in the cite of PLACENTIA: when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great daunger and distresse: he marched thither with his army, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that also, the other Captaines of either side came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing layed a great number of his best souldiers well armed in ambushe, in certaine thicke groues and woddes: he commaunded his

A horsemen to march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retyre lide and lide, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawn them within his ambush. So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choyce men of armes, and did not followe them ouertrahly, but compassed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, and in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speede to his footemen to make haile thitherward: and it seemeth, that if they had comen in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vpon the bellies of all Cecinnas armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should haue done. But Paulinus being comen too late to aide them, for that he came so slowly: he was burdened that he did not the duetie of a Captaine, that bare the name and countenance he carried. Furthermore, the common souldiers accused him of treason vnto Orho, and stirred vp their Emperour against him, and spake verie bigge words of them selues, saying, that they had ouercomen for their owne partes, had not the cowardlines of their Captaines bene, who put them by the victory. So Orho did not trust him so much, that he would not make him beleue but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the campe, and Proculus with him, Captaine of the Prætorian garde, who in deede commaunded all, but in sight Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenaunt. Marius Celsus, and Paulinus followed after, bearing name of counsellers and frends only: howbeit otherwise they meddled with nothing, neither had any authoritie geuen them. On the other side, the enemies were in as much trouble as they; and those specially, whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the conflict that was betweene them in this ambushe, they were angrie with him, bicause they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were slaine: inso much that he had much a doe to pacifie and quiet them, that they were so ready to haue flowne vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his campe, & went & ioyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Orho being comen to his campe at the towne of BABRACVM, which is a litle towne hard by CREMONA: he consulted with his Captaines whether he should geue battell or not. So Proculus and Titianus gaue him counsell to fight, considering that the souldiers were verie willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it: for thereby he shoulde but discourage his armie, which was now willing to fight, and also geue their enemies leasure to tarie for their Chieftaine Vitellius, who came D him selfe out of GAYLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alleaged, that the enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Orho looked for an other armie out of MYSTIA and PANNONIA, as great an armie as his enemies had already, so that he could tary his time, & not serue his enemies turne: and also, that if the souldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they shoulde then be much more incouraged, when they should haue greater companie, and should also fight with better safetie. Furthermore he perswaded them, that to delay time was for their auail, considering that they had plentie and store of all maner of prouision: where the enemies on thother side being also in their enemies contrie, their vittells would quickly faile them. Marius Celsus liked verie well of these perswasions. E And so did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this counsell (but gone from the campe, to be cured of a fall he had from his horse) but he was wrytten to by Orho to haue his opinion also. So Annius Gallus returned aunswere, that he thought it not best to make haile, but to stay for the armie that came out of MYSTIA, considering they were onwarde on their way. Howbeit Orho would not hearken to this counsell, but followed their mindes that concluded of battell: for the which were alleaged diuers occasions. But the chieftest and likeliest cause of all was, that the souldiers which are called the Prætorian gard (being the dayly gard about the Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to proffesse to be a souldier, and to liue like a souldier: they lamented their continuing in ROME, where they liued at ease & pleasure, feasting and banketing, neuer feeling the discomforts and bitter paines of warre, and did therefore so earnestly crie out to fight, that there was no staying of them, as if they should at their first crie and setting forward, haue ouerthrowen their enemies. Moreover, it seemed also that Orho him selfe could no more away with the feare and doubt of the vncertaine successe to come, neither could any longer abide the grievous thoughts of the daunger of his estate, A he was so effeminate, and vnacquainted with sorowe, and paines. This was the cause that carried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put all at adventure. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, and Othoes Secretary. Others also doe report, that both armies had diuers determinations and mindes: as to ioyne all together in one campe, and ioyntly to choofe among them, if they could agree, the worstest man of all the Capitaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a place together, & there to suffer the Senators to choofe such a one Emperour, as they liked best. And sure it is verie likely it was so, considering that neither of them both which were then called Emperours, was thought meete for the place they had: and therefore that these counsellors and considerations might easily fall into the ROMANES fouldiers heades, (who were B wife men and expert fouldiers) that in deede it was a thing for them iustly to milike, to bring them selues into the like miserable time and calamitie, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to suffer, first for Sylla and Marius sakes, and afterwards for Cesar and Pompey, and now to bestow the Empire of ROME either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennes and gluttony: or else vpon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moued Celsus to delay time, hoping to end the warres without trouble and daunger: and that caused Otho also to make the more hast, being affrayed of the same. Howbeit Otho returning backe againe to BRESILIUS, he committed another fault, not only because he tooke his mens good wils from thē to fight, the which his presence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but because also he caried away with him, for the gard of his person, the valliantest fouldiers & most resolute men of all his host. A- bout that time there chanced a skirmish to fall out by the riuier of Po, because Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they saw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and drie wodde, all rubbed ouer with brimstone and pitche, and setting them a fire, they lent them downe the streame. When the barges were in the middelt of the freame, there Iodainlie rose a winde out of the riuier, which blew vpon this woddeflake they had prepared to cast among the enemies workes of this bidge, that first made it smoke, and immediately after fell all on a great flame, which did so trouble the men in the barges, that they were driuen to leape into the riuier to saue them selues: and so they lost their barges, and became them selues also prisoners to their enemies, D to their great shame and mockerie. Furthermore, the GERMANES vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othoes sencers, which of them should winne a litle lland in the middelt of the riuier: they had the vpper hand, and slue many of the sencers. There vpon Othoes fouldiers which were in BERIACVM, being in a rage withall, and would nedes fight: Proculus brought them into the fildes, and went and camped about fiftie furlong out of the citie, so fondly, and so to lide purpose, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the contrie thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their campe to meete with their enemies the same day, and were driuen to march aboue a hundred furlong. Now Paulinus perswaded them to go fayer and softly, and not to make more hast then neede, and would not so soone as they should come, (being wearied with their iorney and trauell) let E vpon their enemies that were well armed, and besides had leasure & time enough to let their men in battell ray, whilst they were going so long a iorney with all their cariage. Now the Capitaines being of diuers opinions about this matter, there came a horsefman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the hast they could, and to loofe no time, but to marche with all speede towards the enemy. So when these letters were red, the Capitaines presently marched forward with their armie. Cecinna vnderstanding of their coming, was attended at the first, and Iodainlie forooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he founde the most parte of his fouldiers already armed, and Valens had geuen them their signall & word of bat- F tell. And in the meane time, whilst the legions were taking their places to set them selues in battell ray: they sent out before the choicest horsefmen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cause) that Vitellius Capitaines would turne on

Othoes

A Othoes side in battell. In somuch that when these men of armes came neare to meete with the yoward of Othoes armie: Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them compa- mions. Vitellius men on the other side tooke this salutation in euill parte, and answered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight. In somuch that those that had spokē to them, were quite discouraged: and the residue also beganne to suspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to ioyne battell. Furthermore, on the enemies side also, all was out of order: for the beasts of Carriage ranne in amongst them that fought, and so did put them mar- uelously out of order. Besides that also, the disaduauntage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of sundry ditches and trenches that were B betwene them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diuers companies together. So there were but two legions onely, the one of Vitellius, called the deuourer: and the other of Otho, called the helper, which getting out of these holes and ditches a part by them selues, in a good plaine euery ground, fought it out so a long time together in good order of batell. Othoes fouldiers were men of goodly personages, strong, and valliant of their handes, howbeit they had neuer serued in the warres, nor had euer foughten battell but that. And Vitellius men on the other side, were olde beate fouldiers, and had serued all their youth, and knew what warres & battells ment. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue such a lusty charge vpon the first oner, that they ouerthrew, & slue all the first rancke, and also wanne the ensigne of the eagle, Vitellius men were so ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke hart againe C vnto them, and ranne in so desperately vpon their enemies, that at the first they slue the colone- nell of all their legion, and wanne diuers ensignes. And furthermore, against Othoes sencers, (which were accounted the valliantest men, and readiest of hande) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the BATTAYN, which are GERMANES in the lower parte of GERMA- ny, dwelling in an lland compassed about with the riuier of Rhein. There were few of his fen- sers that stucke by it, but the most of them ranne away towards the riuier, where they founde certein ensignes of their enemies set in battell ray, who put them all to the sword, and not a man of them escaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beasts & cowards, then the Praetorian gard. For they would not tary till the enemies came to giue them charge, but cowardly turned their backs, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowen, D and so did both disorder them, and also make them affrayd. This notwithstanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who hauing ouerthrowen the yoward of them that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were Conquerors, and so valliantly returned backe into their campe. But of their Capitaines, nether Proculus, nor Paulinus, durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being affraid of the furey of the fouldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Capitaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus receiued them into the citie of BERIACVM, that came together after this ouerthrow, & told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celsus gathering the noble men and gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fell to consultation what they should do in so great a calamitie, & E extreame slaughter of the ROMANES Citizens. For if Otho him selfe were an honest man, he should no more attempt fortune: considering that Caro and Scipio were both greatly blamed, for that they were the cause of casting away many men in AFRICK to no purpose, (though they fought for the libertie of the ROMANES) and onely of selfe will, for that they would not yield to Iulius Caesar after he had wonne the battell of PHARSALIA. For though fortune in all o- ther things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, he can not pre- uent them to determine the best for their safetie. These perswasions straight caried away the Capitaines, who went presently to feele the mindes of the priuate fouldiers, whom they found all of them desirous of peace. So Titianus perswaded them to send Ambassadors vnto the e- F nemies to treat of peace: and Celsus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to goe thither, for to breake the matter vnto Cecinna, and Valens. But by the way they met with certen Centu- rions, who told them how all the army of the enemies were coming on wards on their way, to come directly to the citie of BERIACVM, and that their chieftaines had sent before to offer treaty of peace. Celsus and his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions A that they would returne with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celsus was in great danger of his life: bicaufethe men of armes which he had vnterhowne certain dayes before in an ambush, comming before, when they spied him, they flew vpon him with great howtes. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his compaign, stopped before him, and closed him in: and so did the other Capteines that cryed vnto them, they should do him no hurt. Cecinna vnderstanding what the matter was, roade thither, and passed the tumult of these men of armes: and then saluting Celsus very curteously, he was with him towards Aberracum. But nowe Titianus in the meane time, repeatinge vnto himselfe that he had sent Ambassadors vnto the enemies, he placed the desperat soldiers he had vpon the walls of the cite, and incouraged the rest also to doe the like, and to stand to the defense. But Cecinna came to the wal, & being a horsebacke, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more resistance, but those that were vpon the walles, saluted the souldiers, and they that were within the cite opened the gates, and thrust in amongst Vitellius men; who they coued them, and did no man any hurt, but curteously embraced them, and saluted each other. Then they all sware andooke their othes to be true to Vitellius, and so yielded themselves vnto him. So doe the most part of those that were at this battell, report the successe thereof: graunting notwithstanding, that they knew not euery thing that was done, bicaufe of the great disordred among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was stricken, with Metrius Florus that had beene Consul: he shewed me an olde man that when the field was fought in that place, was younge, and against his will was at the same battell on Othos parte. G Who told vs, that after the battell was fought, he came into the field to suruey the number of those that were dead: and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of those that came to view them. And sayd moreover, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he nether could imagine it him selfe, nor be satisfied by others. Now in deede it is likely, that in ciuill warres betwene contry men of one selfe cite, where one of the two armies is ouerthrowen, that there should be greater slaughter among them, then against the other enemies, bicaufe they take no prisoners of either side: for those they should take, would serue them to no good purpose. But after they were slaine, one to be layed on heapes so by another, that is a hard thing to iudge. But now to the matter. The newes of this ouerthrowe came first but obscurely vnto Otho, a common thing in a matter of so great importance: but afterwarde, when some D that were hurt came and brought him certen newes of it, it was no maruell then to see Othos friendes and familiers to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheere, and not to be discouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the priuat souldiers shewed vnto him at that time, did passe and exceede all speech and education. For they forooke him not, nether went they to submit them selues to their enemies the conquerors, netherooke they any regard of them selues, to see their Emperour in that dispayre: but all of them ioyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperour. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men represented in a triumph lying on the ground, & kissed his hands, with the reares ronning downe their cheekes, and besought him not to forsake and leaue them to their enemies, but to commaund their persons whilste they had one droppe of blud left in their bodies to doe him seruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongst others, there was a poore souldier drawing out his sword, sayd vnto him: know, O Celsus, that all my companions are determined to dye in this fort for thee, and so Ioue him selfe. But all these lamentable things did neuer melt Othos hart: who looking with a stouwe countenance round about him, and casting his eyes euery where, spake vnto them in this maner. I thinke this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperour: to see you loue me so well, and doe me such honor, with so great shew of loyalty. But yet I beseech you not to deny me of a greater fauor, which is: to dye valiantly, and honorably for the sake of so many honest men as you be, and so good Citizens of Rome. If by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne: F I must now needes shewe my selfe an Emperour, not sparing to spend my life, for your and my contries sake. I am certen that the victorie is not altogether myne enemies. For newes are come

A come vnto me, that our armies of MYRIA and PANNONIA are in their way comming to vs, and that they are not farre of from the Adriack sea. ASIA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT, and the legions that make warre in IVRY, are all ours. The Senate taketh our parte, and our enemies wiues and children be in our hands. But this warre is not against Annibal, nor Pyrrhus, nor against the CIMBRES, to fight who should be owners of ITALY: but it is against the ROMANES them selues. For in this ciuill warre, both the Conqueror and vanquished doe offend their contry: for where the Conquerors haue benefit, the contry and common wealth alwayes receyeth losse. Assure your selues I had rather dye, then raigne Emperour: considering also that my life with victorie can not so much benefit the ROMANES, as the sacrifice of the same may doe my contry good, for the peace and quietnes of my contry men, keeping B ITALY thereby from seeing such another battell, as this hath bene. So when he had made this oration vnto them, and put those by, that would haue dissuaded him the contrary: he commaunded all the Senators and his friendes that were present, to auoyde. Then he wrote letters to them that were absent, and also vnto the cities wherethrough they passed, to vie them very curteously, and to see them safely conueyed. Then came his Nephewe Cocceius The Emperour

to him, who was yet but a younge boye, and he did comfort him, and bad him not to be afraid of Vitellius, for he had safely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as carefull of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his sonne, though he was desirous to doe it, vntill such tyme as he sawe the ende of this warre: to thend that if he ouercame, he shoulde quietly raigne Emperour with him: and if he were overcome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cause of his death. But this one thinge C only, I commaunde and charge thee, my sonne, euen as the last commaundement that I can giue thee: that thou doe not forget altogether, nether ouer much remember, that thine Vncle hath bene Emperour. When he had tolde him this tale, he heard a noyse at his dore: they were the souldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him, and would kill them, if they did not remayne with him, but would forsake their Emperour. Vpon this occasion he came out once againe among them, being affrayd lest the souldiers would doe the Senators some hurt, and made the souldiers giue backe, not by intreating of them, nor speaking curteously to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage: in somuch that they all thronge backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was a thirst, and dranke a litle water: and hauing two swordes, he was prouing a great while which had the best edge. D In the ende, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his seruants, and liberally to giue out his money amonge them, to some more, to some lesse, not prodigally throwing it away without discretion, as being another mans money: but discretely gaue to euery man according to his desert. Then after he had dispatched them away, he laid him downe to sleepe al the rest of the night, that the groomes of his chamber heard him snore, he slept so soundly. In the morning he called one of his infranchised bondmen, whom he had commaunded to helpe to saue the Senators, and sent him to see if they were all safe, & gone. So when he vnderstoode that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: come on, said he then vnto him, looke to thy selfe I reade thee, and take heede the souldiers see thee not, E if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen me to kill my selfe. So assoone as his infranchised bondman was gone out of his chamber, he took his sword with both his hands, and setting the poynt of it to his brest, he fell downe vpon it, seeming to feele no other payne, sauing that he fetched a sigh: whereby they that were without, knewe that he had done him selfe hurt. Thereupon his friendes made straight an outcry, and all the campe and cite was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The souldiers sodainly ran with a great noyse to his gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with them selues that they were such Villaines so slenderly to haue garded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing him selfe for their sakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though the enemies were hard at hand: but hauing honorably buried him, and prepared a great stacke of wodde, they conueyed him armed to the fire of his funeralles, euery man thinking him selfe happy, that could first set his shoulders to the coffin to helpe to cary him. Others comming to it, kneeled downe on their knees, and kissed his wound. Others tooke and kist his handes. Others that could not come neare him, honored A him, and did reuerence him a farre of, and some there were also that after the stacke of woode was set a fire, flue them selues hard by the fire: who had neuer received benefit by him that was dead, (at the least to any mans knowledge) nether had they any occasion to be affraid of him, that was Conqueror. And truly me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was so ambitiously giuen to raigne, as they vehemently desired to be commanded by Otho, and to obeye him: considering that their desire left them not euen after his death, but was so liuely rooted in their mindes, that in the ende, it turned to a deadly hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will speake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes ashes, they did set vp a tombe for him, nether for magnificence of building, nor for glorious epitaphe, subject vnto enuy. For I haue seene his tombe in the citie of Bresselles, a meane thing, and the epitaph B vpon it translated out of Latine, sayeth no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He dyed being but feuen and thirty yere olde, and was Emperor but three moneths: & there were as many famous men that commended his death, as they that reprobued his life. For though he liued not much more honeste then Nero, yet he dyed farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Capitaines would haue compelled his souldiers presently to haue taken their othes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and vnderstanding that there were yet remayning some Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his dores armed, and called him by his name, & commanded him to take charge of them, and to goe as Ambassador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already ouercome, considering he refused it when they had ouercome: and also he was affraid to goe C Ambassador to the GERMAINES, bicause he had compelled them to doe thinges against their willes. Therefore he went out at his backe dore, and saued him selfe. So when the souldiers heard of it they were at length contented to be brought to be sworne vnto Vitellius, and so ioyned them selues with Cecinnaes souldiers, so they might be pardoned for all that was past.

Annibal.

A If we doe call to mind the first PYNNICK warre the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMANES: we shall find many Capitaines, who by the glorie of their noble deedes, haue left great fame and renowne vnto their posteritie. Howbeit amongst all the Capitaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and so commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilear, Annibals father, otherwise surnamed Barcha, a valliant man doubles, and in his time a skilfull souldier as any was. The same Hamilear first of all made warre with the ROMANES, a longer tyme in SICILIA then was looked for, who had done greate hurte to his contrie and common wealthe. After that also in B the warres of AFRICK (at what tyme the mercenary souldiers through their rebellion did put the contrie of CARTHAGE in greate daunger) he did so valliantly appease the insurrection: that to euery mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preferer of his contrie. Then he was sent Gouernor and Captaine into SPAYNE, and caryed with him at that tyme, (as it is reported) his sonne Annibal, beeing but a younge boye, where he did noble seruice. In fine, in the nyenth yeare of his aboade there in that prouince, he dyed fighting valliantly agaynst the VETHEONS. After his deathe, Hafdrubal his sonne in lawe, CCCCC ij those miseries which their country afterwards came into. But giving place to the ambitious mind of a young man, they helped themselves on the heads of others, as afterwards fell out upon them. Therefore it is very necessary for wife Magistrates & good rulers of commonwealths, always rather to have an eye to the beginning of any matters, than to the end: & labor to decide all matters by advice & counsel, before they should take any thing in hand. Now the SAGUNTINES seeing their cities besieged by Annibal, & that against all reason & equity he made warres upon them: they notwithstanding valiantly defended the siege many monethes together. Yet in fine, though Annibal had many more men than they (having a hundred & fifty thousand men in his campe) & that the most part of their rampars were buttressed & overthrown: they liked rather to abide the sack of their city, then to yield themselves to the mercy of their mortal enemy. So some doe report, that SAGUNTUS was taken the eight moneth after siege was layed vnto it: But Lanie seemeth not to agree to that, neither to set downe any certain time of the continuance of the siege. Nowe, the taking of this so wealthy a citie, was a great furtherance diuers wayes to Annibals enterprises: For many cities taking example of the sacke of SAGUNTUS, who before mistaking so to be subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell, they kept them selves quiet, and the souldiers also waxed lively and coragious, seeing the rich spoyle that were deuided in the campe. So Annibal sent great presents of the spoiles of the SAGUNTINES vnto CARTHAGE, whereby he wanne the chiefest men of the citie, and made them like the better of warres: whom he determined to leade with him against the ROMANES, not in SPAYNE, as many supposed; but into ITALIE it selfe. Whilest these matters were in hande, the Ambassadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the slender answer they had receiued, in manner at the selfe same time when they had intelligence of the sacke of SAGUNTUS: Hereupon the ROMANES greatly repented them selves, (though somewhat too late) for that they ayded not their friends and confederats in so great a danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very sory for it, and therewith also maruelously offended, they deuided the provinces vnto the Consuls, to wete: SPAYNE vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRIK and SICILIA also vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certain of the noblest men of the citie were sent ambassadors vnto CARTHAGE to make their complaints in open Senate for breache of the peace, and also to denounce vnto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaim open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of them selves. This was as brauely receiued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as lustely offered vnto them: but therein they were not so wel aduised, as the successe of that warren the ende sufficiently proved it to them. Now Annibal being aduertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with him selfe that it was time to goe into ITALIE, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speede he could to prepare his shippes and things ready, and so required ayde of the cities that were his best friends and confederats, and commaunded that all the bands should meete him at newe CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good garisons in places most conuenient, in AFRIK and SPAYNE, which he thought aboute al things els to be most necessary: because that when he should goe into ITALIE, the ROMANES should not winne it from him. Therefore he sent into AFRIK, twelve hundred horsemen, & thirteene thousand footemen, all SPANYARDS: and besides, he brought out of diuers parts of AFRIKES foure thousand souldiers, and placed them in garrison in CARTHAGE, obeynting both hostages and souldiers to his meanes. So he left the gouernment of SPAYNE to his brother Hasdrubal, and gaue him an army of fifty shippes of warre, two thousand horsemen, and twelue thousand footemen. These were the garisons he left in both those provinces. Nowe he thought them not sufficient to withstande the power of the ROMANES, if they bent their warres into SPAYNE, or AFRIK: but because he thought them stronge enough to stay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country: vntill that hauing brought his army by land, he had set foot in ITALIE. Moreover, he knewe that the CARTHAGINIANS were stronge enough to leade a new army if they lysted, and if neede so required, to send him ayde also into ITALIE. For, after that they had driuen away this so dangerous a warre, procured against them through the spight of the mercenary souldiers, hauing euer after obtained victorie first vnder

A the conduct of Hannibal: secondly, vnder Hasdrubal: and lastly, vnder Annibal: they were growen to such grames & strength, that at what time Annibal came into ITALIE, their Empire & dominions were maruelously enlarged. For they had all the coast of AFRIKES, which reacheth ouer against the sea Mediterraneum, from the aduers of the Philenians (which be not farre from the great Syre, vnto Hercules pillars: and containeth in length two thousand paces. So, after they had passed the straight which deuideith AFRICA from BYZANT, they possessed almost all SPAYNE, to the mountaines Pyrenei: which doe deuide SPAYNE from GAULE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRIKES, and SPAYNE, Annibal returned againe to newe CARTHAGE, where his armie was readie for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and incoring them with great and large promises, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALIE: & made great accompt vnto them of the frendshippes of the GAULES, and in the end he had them be of good courage, and set lustely forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his armie all alongest the coast, vnto the riuer of Iberus. It is reported, that the next night following, Annibal dreamed he saw a young man, of a maruelous terrible looke & stature, who bad him follow him into ITALIE: but afterwards, that he saw a snake of a wonderful greatnes, making a maruelous noyse: & being desirous to understand what the same might signifie, it was told him that it betokened the destruction of ITALIE. It is not to be marueled at, though the great care & thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALIE, made his mind to run of such fantasies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destruction, or such other calamities of warre. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator faith: that our thoughts & words do beget such things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet wryteth of Homer: to wit, like to those his minde most ran on, or that he talked of most. Now, after Annibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that he had also won the GAULES haris with bountifull gifts: in few dayes he came to the riuer of Rhone. The head of the riuer of Rhone, is not farre from the heades of the riuers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred farlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENEVA. Then it runneth from thence towards the West, and deuideith the GAULES a pretie way: and then being increased by the riuer of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other riuers in the ende it falleth into the sea with diuers heades, betwext the VOLCES, and the CAVARIANS. The VOLCES, at that time inhabited both the sides of the riuer of Rhone, and were full of people, and the richest of all the other GAULES. They hauing vnderstanding of Annibals coming, passed ouer the riuer, and armed them selves, & prepared on the other side to stoppe the CARTHAGINIANS; that they should not passe ouer. Now, though Annibal had wonne all the other GAULES, yet those he could neuer winne neither by gifts, nor threats, to cause them rather to proue the frendshipp of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Annibal perceiving he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commaunded Hanno the sonne of Bomilcar, secretly to passe ouer the riuer of Rhone, with parte of the armie, and so to set vpon the GAULES on the sodaine. Thereupon Hanno as he was commaunded, made a long iorney, and hauing passed ouer the riuer at passable fords: he shewed him selfe hard by the enemies campe, before they saw him, or that they knewe what it was. The GAULES hearing their shoutes and cries behinde them, and hauing their hands full of Annibal before them, who had many boies ready to passe ouer his men: they hauing no leasure to consult of the matter, neither to arme them selves to stande to defense, left their campe, and fled for life. So they being driuen from the other side of the riuer, the rest of the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS passed ouer it with safetie. In the meane time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a little before was come vnto MAXILIA, still heard newes of Annibals armie. Wherefore, to be more assured of the matter, he sent a bande of choyce horsemen to discouer what the enemies intent was: who making great speede as they were commaunded, met by chance with fise hidred horsemen of the NUMIDIANS, whom Annibal had also sent to bring him word of the ROMANES armie. So, they first sodainly gaue charge vpon the NUMIDIANS, and after a hotte and valliant conflict betwene both the parties, in the end the ROMANES ouercomming them, they made them flee, but with great losse of their men: howbeit the greatest losse and slaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Annibal by this meane founde where the ROMANES lay, and stood in a great doubt with him selfe, whether he should keepe on his way into ITALIE, or else lead his armie against the Consul that then was, and so to proue his happe & successe. At length, debating many wayes in his mind, and vncertaine which way he would determine: the Ambassadors of the BOTIANS perswaded him to leaue all other deuises, and to goe on into ITALIE. For before that Annibal had passed ouer the mountaines Piræne, the BOTIANS hauing by craft taken the ROMANES Ambassadors, and done great mischiefes vnto Manlius the Prætor, and intised the INDIANTIANES also: they were reioyced from the ROMANES, and tooke parte with Annibal, and onely because the ROMANES had replenished the cities of PLACENTIA and CREMONA with people, and had made them Colonies to ROME. So Annibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his campe, and keeping the riuers side, still going against the riuers: in few dayes he came to the place which the GAVLES doe call the Iland, the which the riuier of Arar and Rhodanus commeth from diuers mountaines doe make there. So at this present, there is the famous citie of LION in GAVLES, which they say was built long time after, by Plautus Munatius. From thence he came to the contrie of the ALLOBROGES, and hauing pacified the variance betwix two brethren for the realme, he came through the contrie of the CASTINIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the riuier of Durance. The head of this riuier commeth from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swifft streame, falleth into the riuier of Rhone: & as it oftentimes chaungeth her course, so hath it in manner no passable forde. Yet Annibal hauing past it ouer, he led his armie vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine contries, as farre as he coule: howbeit as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Infomuche that some which were liuing at that time, did affirme, that they heard Annibal him selfe say, that he had lost aboute thirte thousand men, and the most parte of his horsemen. For he was forced not only to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaine, but also compelled to make wayes through the straights: so that in certaine places of the highest rockes, he was driuen to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene dayes space, he came downe into the valley, not farre from the citie of TVRINE. Whereby it seemeth to me, that he passed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one side of it hath the riuier of Druentia, and on the other side it goeth downe to the city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to say truly, what number of men he had when he was comen into ITALIE: because of mens diuerities of opinions. For some wryte, that he had a hundred thousand footemen, D and twentie thousand horsemen: others also write, that he had twentie thousand footemen, and fixe thousand horsemen, all AFRICANS and SPANIARDS. But others, reckoning the GAVLES and LIGURIAS, doe count foure score thousand footemen, and tenne thousand horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his armie was so great, as the first men report, and specially hauing passed through so many contries, and also receiued such losse as he had: neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters doe make it, if a man will consider the famous employes and great enterprises he did afterwards. So that I like their opinions best, which keepe the meane betwene them both: considering that he brought into ITALIE, the better parte of foure score thousand footemen, and tenne thousand horsemen; the which he had leauid in SPAYNE: as it is manifestly knowne also, that a great number of the LIGURIANS and GAVLES came to ioyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMANES, that gaue no place nor grounde vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Annibal being comen from TVRINE, into the contrie of the INSEBRIANS: he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from MASSILLA, and hauing passed the riuers of Po and Tefin, he camped not farre from the enimie. So shortly after, both the Generalls being comen into the field to view eche others campe, the horsemen of either side grew to skirmish, which continued long, and was not to be discerned which of them had the better. Howbeit in the end, the ROMANES seeing the Consul hurt, and also that the horsemen of the NYMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compass them in: they were driuen to geue ground, and so pretily retried, defending the Consul the best they coule to saue him, and so at length recovered their campe. It is reported that Publius Cornelius Scipio, was saued at that time through his sonnes helpe, who afterwards was called AFRICAN, and at that time was

A but a young stripling: whose praise though it was wonderfull in so greene a youth, yet it is likelie to be true, because of the famous and valliant actes he did afterwards. Nowe Scipio hauing proued how much his enimie was stronger then him selfe in horsemen: he determined to place his campe so, as his footemen might be in best safety, & also fight with greatest aduantage. And therefore the next night following he passed the riuier of Po, and made as litle noyse as he coule, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like shortlie after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene restored from banishment by the Senate, and sent for out of SICILIA: because both the Consuls should gouerne the common wealth by one selfe authoritie. Annibal also followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neere vnto the riuier of Trebia: hoping that because both camps lay so neere together, some occasion would be offered to fight, the which he chieflie desired, both because he coule not long maintaine warre for lacke of vittells, as also that he mistrusted the fickleness of the GAVLES. Who, like as they soone fell in league and frendship with him, drawn vnto it with hope of change, and with the same allo of his victorie obtained: so he mistrusted that vpon any light occasion (as if the warre should continue any long time in their contrie) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMANES, against him, as the only author of this warre. For these respectes therefore, he deuised all the meanes he coule to come to battell. In the meane time, Sempronius the other Consul, met with a troupe of the enemies, laden with spoyle, stragling vp and downe the fieldes, whom he charged, and put to flight. So imagining the like successe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall: he had good hope of victorie, if once both the armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruelous desirous to doe some notable enterprife before Scipio were recovered of his hurt, and that the new Consul should be chosen: he determined to ioyne battell against the will of his other colleague and fellowe Consul Scipio, who thought nothing could be to lesse purpose, then to put all the state and common wealth in iopardie, speciallie hauing all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field against him. Now, Annibal had secret intelligence of all this variance, by spials he had sent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politike and futtle as he was, found out a place straight betwene both camps, couered ouer with bushes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lye in ambush, with a companie of chosen men. Then he commaunded the horsemen of the NYMIDIANS, to scurrie to the trenches of the ROMANES, to intise him to come to battell; and thereupon made the residue of his armie to eate, and so put them in verie good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occasion offered. Now the Consul Sempronius, at the first tumult of the NYMIDIANS, sodainly sent his horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out six thousand footemen, and in the ende, came him selfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middest of winter, and extreame cold, and speciallie in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Nowe the NYMIDIANS as they were commaunded, intised the ROMANES by litle and litle on this side the riuier of Trebia, vntill they came to the place where they might discern their enignes: and then they sodainly turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NYMIDIANS, oftentimes to flie of set purpose, and then to stay vpon the sodaine when they see time, to charge E their enimie more hotly and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horsemen together, and did set his men in battell ray, as time required, to geue charge vpon his enimie, that stayed for him in order of battell. For Annibal had cast his men into quadrons, readie vpon any occasion. The skirmish beganne first by the light horsemen, & afterwards increased hotter by supplie of the men of armes: howbeit the ROMANES Knights being vnable to beare the thocke of the enemies, they were quickelie broken. So that the legions maintained the battell with such furie & noble corage, that they had bene able to haue resisted, so they had fought but with footemen onely. But on the one side, the horsemen and Elephants made them affraid, and on the other side the footemen followed them with luste-ly, and fought with great furie against famished and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMANES F notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on euery side, with an vnspicable corage and magnanimitie; such as was aboue their force and strength, they fought fully vntill that Mago comming out of his ambush, came and sodainly assailed them with greathowres and cries, and that the middle Squadron of the CARTHAGINIANS also (through Annibals A cōmaundement) flew vpon the CENOMANIANS. Then the ROMANES seeing their confederats flie, their hearts were done, and vterly discouraged. It is sayd that there were tenne thousande foote men of the ROMANES got to PLACENTIA, and came through the enemies. The rest of the armie that fledde, were most parte of them slaine by the CARTHAGINIANS. The Conful Sempronius also escaped verie narrowlie from the enemies. The victorie cost Annibal the setting on also: for he lost a great number of his men, and the most parte of all his Elephanes were slaine. After this battell, Annibal overcame all the contrie, and did put all to fire and sword, and tooke also certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the con-trie men flie, that were disorderlie gathered together in battell. Then at the beginning of the spring, he brought his army into the field sooner then time required: & meaning to goe into B THUSCAN, he was driuen backe by a great tempest at the verie toppes of the height of the Ap-penine, and so compelled to bring his armie about PLACENTIA: howbeit shortly after he put himselfe againe into the fields for diuers vrgent & necessary causes. For had he not faued him selfe by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the GAYLES: who being angry with him that the warre continued so long in their contrie, they fought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occasion of the warre. Therefore perceiuing it was time for him to auoyde this daunger, he made all the hast he could to leade his armie into some other prouince. Furthermore, he thought it would increase his estimation much among straungers, & also greatly encourage his owne people, if he could make the power of the CARTHAGINIANS to seeme so great, & also their Captaine to be of so noble a courage, as to dare to make warre so C neere to the cite of ROME. All things therefore set a part, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and so coming through the contrie of the LIGURIANS, he came into THUSCAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion contrie, & to the marishes about the river of Arnus. The river of Arnus at that time was very high, and had ouerflown all the fields thereof. Annibal therefore marching with so great an army as he had, could not a-uoyde it, but that he must needs lose a number of his men & horse, before he could get out of those euill fauored marishes. In such manner that he him selfe lost one of his eyes, by reason of the great paines he had taken day & night without sleepe or rest, and also through the euill ayer: though he was caried vpon a high Elephants back, which only was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Conful, to whom the charge of Septronius D army was geuen: he was come vnto ARETIVM against the Senates minde, who were maruelously offended with him, because he left his copanion Cn. Seruilius at ROME, & went vnto his prouince by stealth as it were, without the furniture of a Conful & his officers. This was a very hasty man of nature, & one whom the people had brought to that dignity & office: so that he was become so proud & insolent that men might see he would hazard all things without wit or iudgement. Annibal hauing intelligence hereof, thought it the best way to anger the Consul, & to do what he could possible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Conful should come to ioyne with him. Therefore, he marching forward with his campe through the contrie of FESVLA, & ARETIVM, he burnt & spoiled all the contrie thereabout, & filled them all with feare, neuer leauing to destroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountaines Cortoneses, B & so to the lake called Thrasimene. When he had viewed the place, he went about to surpris his enemy by some ambush: whereupon he conueied certain horsemen vnder the hills, hard by the straight that goeth vnto Thrasimene, and behind the mountaines also, he placed his light horsemen. Then he him selfe with the rest of his army came downe into the field, supposing that the Conful would not be quiet: and so it fell out. For his stirring heades are easily intrapped, & fall into the enemies ambush, & oftentimes do put all in hazard, because they will follow no counsel nor good aduise. C. Flaminius therefore, seeing their contrie vterly spoiled, the corne disseined and cut downe, and the houses burnt: he made great hast to lead his armie against the enemy, contrarie to all mens minds, who would haue had him taried for his companion Cn. Seruilius the other Conful. So euen at sunne set, when he was come to the straights of the lake of Thrasimene, he caused his campe to stay there, although his men were not wea-rie with the long iorney they had taken by the way. So the next morning by breake of day,

The office of

Q. Fabius Maximus, created Dictator.

A making no view of the contrie, he went ouer the mountaines. Then Annibal who long before was prepared for this, did but stay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he saw the RO- MANES come into the plaine, he gaue a signall vnto all his men to geue charge vpon the ene-mie. Thereupon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euerie side, came before and be-hinde, and on the flanks to assaile the enemy, being shut in betwene the lake and the moun-taines. Now in contrarie manner, the ROMANES beginning to fight out of order, they fought inclosed together, that they could not see one another, as if it had bene darke: so that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out so long, considering they were compassed in on euerie side. For they fought it out about three howres space, with such fury and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that present time, neither B did they offer to flie or stirre a foote: vntill they heard that the Conful C. Flaminius going from rancke to rancke to encourage his men, was slaine by a man of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had lost their Generall, and being voyde of all hope: they fled, some towards the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuers of them flying, were overtaken & slaine. So there were slaine * fifteen thousand in the field, & there escaped about ten thousand. Furthermore the report went, that there were six thousande foote men which forcible (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there stayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Annibals promise: but they were betrayed, and slaine, euery mothers sonne of them. After this great victorie, Annibal did let diuers ITALIAN prisoners goe free without ranfome paying, after he had vied them maruelous curteouslie: C because that the fame of his clemencie & curtesie should be knowne vnto all nations, whereas in deede his owne nature was contrarie to all vertues. For he was hasty and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in warres, and exercised in murder, treason, & ambushes layed for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor ciuill gouernment. So by this meanes he became one of the cruelliest Captaines, the most furtell, and craftiest to deceiue and intrap his enemy, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemy: so those whom he could not overcome in warre by plaine force, he went about to intrappe by slight and po-licie. The which appeareth true by this present battell, and also by the other he fought against the Conful Sempronius, by the riuier of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leaue this talke till another time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow and death of the Conful Fla- minius was reported at ROME, hauing lost the most parte of his armie: there was great mone and lamentation made through all the cite of ROME. Some bewailing the common miserie of the common wealth, others lamenting their priuate particular losse, & some also sorowing for both together. But in deede it was a woefull sight, to see a world of men & women to run to the gates of the cite, euerie one priuily asking for their kinne and frends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very forie and pensife, dispaire of the safetie of their sonnes, dyed sodainly for the extreame ioy they had, when beyond their expectation & hope they sawe their sonnes aliue and safe. At the selfe same time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conful with C. Flaminius, did send him foure thousand horsemen, not vnderstanding yet of the battell that was fought by the lake of Thrasimene. But when they heard of the ouerthrow of E their men by the way, and therefore thought to haue fled into VMBRIA: they were compassed in by the horsemen of the enemies, and so brought vnto Annibal. Nowe the Empire of ROME being brought into so great extremitie and daunger, because of so many small losses one in the necke of another: it was ordeined, that an extraordinary Gouernor or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator: an office specially vied to be referred for the last hope and remedie, in most extreame daunger and perill, of the state and common wealth. But because the Conful Seruilius could not returne at that time to ROME, all the waies being kept by the enemy: the people contrarie to their custome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the surname of Maximus, to say, verie great) who likewise did name M. Minutius Generall of the horsemen. Now this Fabius was a graue and wise counsellor, and F of great authoritie and estimation in the common wealth: in such manner as the citizens had their hope and confidence in him onely, perswading them selues, that the honor of ROME might be better preferred vnder the gouernment and conduct of such a Generall, rather then under the government of any other man whatsoever. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefullie and diligentlie given order for all things necessarie: he departed from Rome, and when he had receiued the armie of the late Consul Cn. Seruilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and so went vnto the enemy. Nowe Annibal was gone from the lake of Thrasymene, and went directly towards the cite of Spoletum, to see if he could take it at the first assault. But when he saw that the townes men stood vpon the rampers of the walls, and valliantlie defended them selues: he then left the towne, and destroyed the contrie as he went, and burnt houses and villages, and so went into Apulia, through the marches of Asconia, and the contries of the Marsians and Pelignians. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the cite of Apsy, not farre from the campe of the enemy, to thend to drawe out the warre at length. For the rashnesse and foolhardines of the former Captaines affore time, had brought the state of Rome into such miserie: that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be overcome by the enemy, that had so often overcome them. Whereby all things were turned straight with the chaunge and alteration of the Captaine. For, though Annibal had set his men in battell ray, and afterwards perceiuing his enemy sturred not, went and destroyed the contrie, hoping thereby to intise the Dictator to fight, when he should see the contrie of his confederates so spoyled, as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithstanding, was not moued withall, but still kept his men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Annibal was in a maruelous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often removed his campe, to the ende that going diuers wayes, some occasion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemy, or else to geue battell. So when he had passed the mountaine Appennine, he came vnto Samnium. But because shortly after, some of Campania, who haue bene taken prisoners by the lake of Thrasymene, had bene set at libertie without ranfome: they putting him in hope that he might take the cite of Capua, he made his armie march forward, and tooke a guide that knew the contrie, to bring him vnto Casertum. Nowe the guide overhearing Casertum, vnderstoode it Casilinum, & so mistaking the found of the word, brought the armie a cleane contrary way vnto Calentinum, and Calenum, and from thence about Stella. So when they came into a contry enuironned about with mountaines and riuers, Annibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patientlie, and was contented to geue Annibal libertie to take his pleasure which way he would: vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Casilinum, where he placed his garrison, being places of great aduantage and commoditie. So the armie of the Carthaginians was in manner compassed in euery way, and they mult needes haue dyed for famine in that place, or else haue fled to their great shame and dishonor: had not Annibal by this stratageme prevented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his armie stood in, and hauing spied a fit time for it: he commanded his souldiers to bring forth two thousand oxen which they had gotten in spoyle in the fields, hauing great store of them, and then tying torches or fire linkes vnto their homes, he appointed the nimblest men he had to light them, and to driue the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the first watch. All this was duly executed according to his commandement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them fayer and softly. Now the Romans that had long before placed a strong garrison vpon the mountaines, they were affrayed of this strange sight, and mistrusting some ambushe, they forthwith forooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius him selfe mistrusting also that it was some stratageme of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to say to it. In the meane time, Annibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Swellia, which the contrie men doe call the tower of the bathes, and brought all his armie safe into Alba: and shortly after, he marched directlie as though he would goe to Rome, howbeit he sodainlie turned out of the way, and went presentlie into Apulia. There he tooke the cite of Glerenum, a verie riche and wealthie towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him harde, and came and camped by Laurinum, not farre from the Carthaginians campe. So he being sent for to Rome about waichtige Affaires of the state, there was no remedy but he must needs depart thence with all the speed he could: howbeit before he went, he left Attarod his brother in law, General of the horsemen, his Lieutenant of all the armie, and commanded him in his absence to be obedient to Fabius, not to meddle with the enemy. For he was fullie bent to follow his first determination, which was not to vex the enemy, nor to fight with him, though he were provoked to it. Howbeit Attarod little regarding the Dictators commandements, his backe was no longer turned, but he set vpon a companie of the enemies dispersed in the fields at morning, and slew a great number of them: and fought with the rest, euen vnto the campe. The rumor of this battell flew straight to Rome, and there was such great exultation of it, that it was esteemed as a victorie: and the common people went to it full of ioy, that they straight made the powder of the Lieutenant, equall with the Dictator Fabius: the which was neuer heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreme iniurie with a noble courage, hauing noway defended in the returned againe vnto the campe. Thus there were two Dictators upon one selfe time (a thing neuer seene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the army betweene them both, the one commanded his army a parte, as the Consuls were wont to doe before. Attarod thereupon grew to such a pride and haughty mind, that one day he went to geue battell, and made not his companion Fabius a counsell withall, the which Annibal hauing so often overcome, durst scantlie haue enterprised. So he led his army into such a place, where the enemy had compassed them in: insomuche that Annibal thus shew as his pleasure, without any hope left them to escape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather bespeaking the honor of his contrie, then remembering the priuate iniurie he had receiued. For he coming fresh with his armie to the battell, made Annibal affrayed, that the Romans legions had libertie to retire with safetie. Whereby Fabius wanne great fame for his wisdom and valliantnesse, both of his owne souldiers, as also of the enemies them selues. For it was reported that Annibal (should say, returning into his campe: that in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was also overcome by Fabius. And Minutius selfe also confessing Fabius wisdom, & considering that (according to Hesiodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better man then him selfe: he came with all his armie vnto Fabius campe, & renouncing his authority, came and humbly saluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was great ioy, and reioycing among the souldiers. So both the armies being placed in garrison for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Consuls created: L. Paulus Aemilius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Consul. So they had libertie and commission to leaue a greater armie then the Generalls before them had done. Whereby the legions were newly supplied, and also others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Consuls were come into the armie, as they were of seuerall dispositions, so did they also obserue diuers manners in their government. Lucius Paulus, who was a wise and grave man, and one that purposed to followe Fabius counsell and facions: he did desire to drawe out the warre in length, and to stay the enemy without fighting. Varro on the other side was a haughty man, and venturous, and desired nothing but to fight. So it chaunced, that no long after it was known, to the great cost and danger of the cite of Rome, what difference there was betwext the modestie of Aemilius, and the foolhardinesse of Varro. For Annibal beinge affrayed of some sturte and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, he departed from Glerenum, and goinge into the warmest places of Apulia, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called Cannae. So he was followed with both the Consuls, who came and camped feuerallie harde by him, but so nere one to another, that there was but the riuier of Aufide that parted them. This riuier as it is reported, doth alone deuide the mountayne of the Appennine, and takeh his head on that side of the mountayne that lyeth to the sea side, from whence it runneth to the sea Adriaticum. Nowe, Lucius Paulus findinge that it was impossible for Annibal beinge in a strange country to mayntayne so great an armie of such fundre nations together: he was fullie bent to traecte time, and to auoyde battell, perfwadinge him selfe that it was the right and onelie way to overcome him, being as muche to the enemies disadvantage.

as so maruelous profitable and beneficial for the common wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varro, had carried that minde, which beneuolt of all doubt, that Annibals armie had bene ouerthrowen by the ROMANES, without shoke shaking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus Aemilius authority: but as contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complaynd before the souldiers, for that he kept his men pent up, and idle; whilest the enemy did pursue his meane to the field in battell ray. So when his tyme came, that he was absolute to commaunde the whole armie; (for they both had absolute power by turnes) he passed out the riuier of Aufide by breake of day; and gaue the signall of battell without the priuilege of his companion Aemilius, who rather followed him against his will, then willingly, because he could doe none otherwise. So he caused a skarlet coate of armes to be put out before him in the morning, for signall of battell. Annibal on the other side as glad of it as was he: he possible as he had occasion offered him to fight, (considering that the contrarie delaying of battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his armie ouer the riuier, and had straight put them in verie good order. For he had taken great spoiles of his enemies to furnish him selfe with verie braunces. Nowe the armie of the ROMANES stoode Southward, in such a manner that the Southwinde (which the men of the contrie call Venturnus) blew full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie manner had the vantage of the winde and Sunne vpon their backs; and their battell stoode in this manner. The AFRIKANES were placed in both the wings; and the GAULS and SPANYARDS set in Squadron in the middle. The light horsemen first beganne the skirmithe, and after them followed the men of armes: and because the space betweene the riuier and the footemen was verie narrow, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So the horsemen of the ROMANES being ouerthrowen, the footemen came with such a lubie charge to meete the charge, that they thought they should not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit the earnest desire they had to overcome their enemies, made their overthrowe more miserable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAULS and SPANYARDS, (which as we haue sayd before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the ROMANES, they retired towards the AFRIKANES in the wings. The ROMANES perceiuing that, ran vpon the enemy with all the fury they could, and had them in chafe and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middle of them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both wings, came & compassed them in before they were aware. Moreover, there were six hundred of the NUMIDIAN horsemen, that cullerably fled into the Consul, who receiued them very courteously, & placed them in the reuerend of the army. They seeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, & did suddenly geue them charge. Then the army of the ROMANES was vterly ouerthrowen, & Annibal obtained victory. Linie writeth that there were slaine in this battell forty thousand footmen, and about two thousand seven hundred horsemen. Polybius saith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the ROMANES had neuer greater losse, neither in the first warre with AFRICE, nor in the seconde by the CARTHAGINIANS, as this ouerthrowe that was geuen at CANNES. For there was slaine, the Consul Paulus Aemilius him selfe, a man verie doubtlesse deserving great praise, and that serued his contrie and common wealth euen to the hower of death: Cn. Scruilius, Consul the yeare before, he was also slaine there, and many other that had bene Consuls, Pretors, and others of such like dignitie, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honest citizens, and that such a number of them, that the verie crueltie it selfe of the enemy was satisfied. The Consul Terentius Varro, who was the onelie author of all this warre and slaughter, seeinge the enemy victorie euery waye, he saved him selfe by flyinge. And Tadius a Chieftaine of a bande, comming through his enemies with a good companie of his men; he came vnto CANSIVM. Thither came also about tenne thousand men, that had escaped from their enemies, as out of a dangerous forme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole armie was geuen vnto Appius Fulcherus, and also vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwards did ende this warre. Thus was the ende of this battell fought by CANNES: Newes flew straight to ROME of this ouerthrowe,

At the which though they iustly filled all the cite with sorrowe and calamitie, yet the Senate and people of ROME kept alwayes their countenance and greatnes, euen in this extreame miserie. In such a manner that they had not only good hope to keepe their city safe, but furthermore they leauiued a new army & made young men to beare armor, & yet left not SICILIA and SPANYA vnprouided in the meane time: so that they made the world to wonder at them, to consider these things how they could in so great calamitie & trouble haue so noble hardnes, & such wise counsell. But to let passe the former ouerthrowes, & great losses they sustained at TACINVM, at TEBRIA, and at the lake of Trasimene: what nation or people could haue borne this last plague, whereby the whole force & power of the ROMANES was in manner vterly destroyed and ouerthrowen; and yet the people of ROME so held it out, & that with so great wisdom & counsell: that they neither lacked manhood, nor magnanimity. Besides, to help them the more, Annibal being conqueror, trifling time in taking his leisure, & refreshing his army, he gaue the ROMANES leasure that were overcome to take breath againe, & to restore them selues. For doubtlesse, if Annibal being conqueror, had immediately after the victorie obtained, brought his armie directly to ROME: surely the ROMANES had bene vterly vidone, or at the least had bene copelled to haue put all in venter. So, it is reported, that Annibal oftentimes afterwards repented him selfe he followed not his victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counsell which waded him to let his souldiers rest, then Mahabals aduise, general of his horsemen; who would haue had him gone straight to ROME, and so to haue ended all this warre. But he seeinge Annibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now common in euery mans mouth: C. Annibal, thou knowest how to overcome, but thou knowest not how to vie victory. But what all things are not (as Nestor saith in Homer) geuen to men all together. For some had no skill to overcome, others knew not how to follow their victory, & some also could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES that made warre with the ROMANES, was one of the famouslest Captaines that euer was yet; as men write of him, though he was maruelous fortunate to conquer realmes, he could neuer keepe the. Euen so in like manner, some Captaines haue bene indued with excellen vertues, & yet notwithstanding haue bene insufficient in martiall faies, deseruing praise in a Captaine: as we may read in diuers histories. Now after this battell fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALATINIANS, the SAMNITIANS, & after this also, the BRYTIANES & LYCANIANS, & diuers other nations & people of ITALY, carried away with the fame of this great victory: they all came & yielded vnto Annibal. And the city of CAPVA also, (the which Annibal was desirous to haue won long before) forsaking their old friends & confederates, made new league & friendship with Annibal, the which wan him great estimation with other nations. For at that time the city of CAPVA was very populous & of great power, & the chieftest city of estimation of all ITALY, next vnto ROME. Now to tel you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the THYSCANIANS, the which was first called, VLTIVNYM, & after that CAPVA, by the name of their Gouvernor called Capiturus: or thierwife, (as it is most likely) because of the fieldes round about it. For on euery side of it, there are goodly pleasant fieldes, full of all kindes of frutes growing on the earth, called in Greeke, Kepti. Furthermore, all the contrie is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the sea there dwell the SYSSANTIANS, the CYMANIANS, and the NEAPOLITANS. On firme land also towards the North, are the CALENTINIANS, and the CALABIANI. On the East and South side, the DAYNIANS and NOLANIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a strong situation, and on the one side is compassed in with the sea, and on the other side with great high mountains. Now the CAMPAINIANS flourished maruelously at that time: and therefore, seeing the ROMANES in manner vterly vidone by the battell they had lost at CANNES, they quickly tooke parte with the stronger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore, besides that they made league with Annibal, they receiued him into their city with great triumphe, hoping that the warre being ended, they should be the chieftest & wealthiest of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceived in their expectation. Now, when Annibal came into the city of CAPVA, there was a worlde of people that went to see him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had wonne of the enemy. So being come into the cite, they brought him vnto Pacurnus house, his verie familiar frende, who was a man of great wealth and authority, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he A made him a notable banker, to the which no citizens were bidden, saving only Isidellus Taurus, a stout man, and the sonne of Paculus his host: who through his fathers meanes, with much a doe, was reconciled to Annibal, for that Annibal hated him as he did, because he followed Decius Magnus, who alwayes tooke the ROMANES parte. But now, let vs consider a litle I pray you, how great men sometime vnwares are subiect to great daungers and misfortunes.

For this young man dissembling his reconciliation with Annibal, watching time & occasion now with standing to do him some displeasure, in the time of this feast, while they were making merie: he tooke his father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will againe of the ROMANES, the which they had lost through their great wickednesse. Then he tolde him howe he was determined to kill Annibal, the enemy of his contrie, and all ITALIE besides. His father that was a man of great countenance, and authority, was maruelously amazed withall, to heare what his sonne said: wherefore imbracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he praised him to leaue of his sword, and to let his gheft be safe in his houle. The which his sonne in the end yielded to with great a doe. Thus Annibal hauing before with stood all the force of his enemies, the ambushes of the GAVLES, and hauing brought with him also a great army from the sea, and the furdert parte of SPAYNE, through so many great and mightie nations: he escaped killing verie narrowlie by the hande of a young man, whilet he was at the table making merie. The next morning Annibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promises, and tolde them many things, which the CAMPANIANS easily beleued, and therefore flattered them selues, that they should be Lords of all ITALIE: howbeit they reckoned beside their hoast. And to conclude, they did so cowardly submit them selues to Annibal: that it seemed they had not onely suffered him to come into their cite, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, like men that neither remembered, nor regarded their libertie.

And this appeareth plainlie by one example I will shew you amongst many. Annibal willed them to deliuer him Decius Magnus, the head of the contrarie faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not onely obeyed with all humilitie, but worst of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the presence of all the people: who, because he woulde not forsake the auncient league and friendship with the ROMANES, had shewed him selfe a more faithfull citizen to his contrie and common wealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whilet these thinges passed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Annibals brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happie victorie to his contrie men, which they had wonne of the enemies: and with all, before the Senate to declare the noble exploit of armes done by Annibal, and to proue the words true he spake, he poored out at the coming in of the Senate house, the golden rings which had bene taken from the ROMANES Knights: of the which there were (as some doe report) aboute a bushell full, and as other some doe wryte, aboute three bushells and a halfe. After that, he praised a new supply for Annibals army: the which was granted him by the Senate with greater ioy, the afterwards it was sent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perswading them selues by the things present, that the warre woulde fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was fayer: they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aide Annibals attempts, by leauing of souldiers. Now no mā withstood this new supply to be sent to Annibal, but Hanno, a perpetuall enemy of the Barcinian faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS wayed not his counsell and aduise then, though it tended to peace, and was good counsell for them, as oftentimes before he had vsed the like. So when Annibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his campe before the cite of NOLA, hoping they would yeeld of them selues without compulsion. And certeinlie so had it come to passe, had not the sodaine coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the sedition, & repulsd the enemy that was coming into the cite, by a saile he made vpon him at three feuerall gates, chasing & killing them euen to their campe, with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and valliant souldier Marcellus, who with a noble courage made the world knowe that Annibal was not inuincible. Annibal perceiving that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone till an other time: he came to ACERRAS, and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going

A further with greater power vnto CASTILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win them that lay there in garrison: but when he saw that neither his fayer promises, nor otherwise his threats coulde preuaile, he left parte of his armie to besiege the cite, and bestowed the residue in garrisons before the winter season. Howbeit he chose for his chiefeft seate and strength the cite of CAPVA, which stood verie pleasauntlie, and had plentie of all thinges. There it was that Annibals souldiers being yeld to lye hard, and easely to away with colde, hunger, and thirst, became then of valliant men, rancke cowardes: of strong men, weaklings: and of seruiceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate persons, through the daily pleasures they enjoyed at will. For sweeter inticing pleasures, do corrupt the strength and courage of the mind, and mans disposition alio vnto vertue: moreover they spoile his wit, and take all good counsell from him, all which thinges are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightlie calleth pleasure, the bayte of all euils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS more, then otherwise the highest Alpes, and all the armies of the ROMANES did. For one onlie winter passed ouer in suche pleasure and wantonnes, was of such great force to extinguish the vehement courage in the souldiers: that when they were brought into the fildes at the beginning of the spring, sure you would rightlie haue sayd that they had forgotten all martiall discipline. Thus the winter being passed ouer, Annibal returned againe to CASTILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeeld vnto him, after they had abidden so long a siege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extremity, before they would yeeld to their so cruell an enemy, although they lacked vittells. Wherefore living first by spelt, or beere barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had received of the ROMANES by the riuier of Vulturnus: they held it out so long, that Annibal in the end being angry with the continuance of the siege, he was content to take the cite vpon composition, the which he had refused before. Now this warre, in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and receiued any losse worthy of memorie: began at that time to decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the newe aide and supplie that was sent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSENTIA, & of other cities of the contrie of the BRYTTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other side, the great victories which the ROMANES had won vpon the enemies in SPAYNE, & SARDINIA, did greatly encourage them, and gaue them also good hope that their affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthy of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely gouerned the affaires of the state, that Annibal found he should make warre with an enemy, no lesse politike and wise, then hardy and valliant. For first of all, he was driuen from the cite of CVMES, with great slaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raise his siege: and thortile after he was ouercomen by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NOLA. For there were slaine about a thousand ROMANES, & six thousand CARTHAGINIANS, slaine, & taken flying. Now it is easily seene what great importance that batel was of: because Annibal immediately vpon it, raised his siege from NOLA, & went into APVLIA to winter his army there. By this meanes came the ROMANES to recouer againe, as out of a great sicknes, and sent a great power against the enemy: and were not content only to keepe their owne, but they durst also inuade others. So their chiefeft intent was, to besiege the city of CAPVA, for the iniurie they had but lately receiued of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the batel was fought at CANNE, they forooke the ROMANES, & in their greatest extremity & misery, & tooke part with Annibal that was conqueror, forgetting the great pleasures their city had receiued in old time by the ROMANES. On the other side the CAMPANIANS, knowing they had made a fault, & being afraid of this new preparatio of the ROMANES: they sent to Annibal into APVLIA, to pray him to come & aide their city (being of the number of his confederats) in their greatest necessity. Annibal departed out of APVLIA without delay, & came on with great torneys into

F CAMPANIA, & caped by TIFATA ouer CAPVA, whereby he rather deferred till another time, the preuented the plague haging ouer the CAMPANIANS heades. So spoiling the cōtry roūd about NAPLES, he began to take cōceit of a new hope, that he might take the city of NOLA by treason,

v. note by Annibal.

For in NOLA, the people and Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewise in diuers other cities of ITALIE. The common people desirous of change, favored Annibal: and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of ROME. So when Annibal went to take the cite of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his army in battell raye, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, euen at the first meeting. There the ROMANES ouercame, and draue the enemy with such manhood and readines: that if the horsemen which had taken another way had come in time, as Marcellus commaunded them: no question the CARTHAGINIANS had bene vnterly ouerthrowen. Annibal after he had retired his army into his campe with great slaughter, he shortly after departed thence, & went into the contry of the SALENTINIANS. For certaine young TARENTINES that had bene prisoners in former battells, where the ROMANES had bene ouerthrowen, and that were afterwards deliuered free without ranfome: they to shew them selues thankful, had put Annibal in hope to deliuer him the city of TARENTVM, so he would but bring his army before the city. Annibal intified by their promises, did what he could to obtaine it, because he might haue some city vpon the sea in his power, the which he had desired of long time. And in deede, of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meete as TARENTVM, to bring aide out of GRECE thither, & also to furnish the cape with many things that were to be occupied daily. So, though this thing was drawn out in length, by the garrison of the ROMANES that valliantlie resisted: yet Annibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprife, vntill that Nico and Philomenes the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the cite into his hands. The ROMANES kept only the castell, the which is in manner enuironned with the sea on three sides: and on the fourth side, that lay vpon the firme lande, it was verie strong with rampers and bulwarkes. Annibal perceiving that he could doe no good on that side, because of their great strength: he determined to shut vp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMANES yield, when their vittells should be cut from them. Yet the enterprife seemed very hard, because the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, and the shippes also that should besiege the issue of the hauen, were shut vp in a litle narrow place, and were to be drawn out of the hauen, at the foote of the castell, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprife to passe: Annibal him selfe perceived that these shippes might be drawn out of the hauen with certaine engines, & then to cart them through the city to the sea. So hauing few cunning workmen in hande with the matter, the shippes within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, and caried into the sea, and then came and shewed before the barre of the hauen. Thus the cite of TARENTVM being won againe, after the ROMANES had kept it the space of a hundred yeares: Annibal leauing the castell besieged both by sea and land, he returned vnto SAMNIVM. For the Consuls of the ROMANES had spoyled and stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, and hauing brought their army before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by siege. Wherefore Annibal being very sorry for the siege of CAPVA, he came with al his army against the enemy: & seeing shortly after that the ROMANES did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward. And doubtles to fight it would haue proued a bloody battell, had not Sempronius army seuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA vnder the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the cōtry of LVBE. For, they seeing this army farre off, before they could know who they were, the ROMANES & CARTHAGINIANS both were affraid, & so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into severall cōtries, the one into LVBE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Annibal remoue from CAPVA who went into LVCANIA, & found occasiō to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly & desperately did hazard his army left him in charge, against a fittell and dangerous enemy. The battell being begon, M. Centenius was slaine valiantly fighting, & few other escaped. After this also, there hapned another losse. For Annibal returning shortly after into APVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMANES, the which Fabius the Prætor led, who also intrapped that army by ambushes, & slew the most of the: so that of twenty thousand me, two thousand scant escaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiving that Annibal was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, & did besiege it rouf. This being come to Annibals care, he came with his

his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order, & wel appointed: & at his first coming, he set vpon the campe of the ROMANES, hauing first willed the CAMPANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a false out on the. The ROMANE Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuoted the army betwene them, and went against them. The CAMPANIANS were easily driuen againe into the cite: howbeit against Annibal, the battell was very bloody. For if euer he proued him selfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprise the ROMANES by some stratageme. For as his men were about to breake into the ROMANES campe, he sent one thither that had the Latine tongue excellently well, who cryed out, as by commaundement of the Consuls, that the ROMANES should saue them selues in the next Mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe and strength. This crye made on the sodaine, had easily moued them that heard it, if the ROMANES being thoroughly acquainted with Annibals fittelties, had not found out his deceit. Wherefore, one of them incraging an other, they made the enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his heard to flie into his campe. When Annibal had done what he could by all deuise and practise possible to rayse their feege from CAPVA, and perceiving all would not serue, being tory for the daunger of his confederats: he then determined to call a counsell, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing referred it for the last refuge. For he trusted vp his cartiage, and marched away with his army, and as quietly as he could he passed ouer the riuier of Vulturius, and coasting through the contries of the SIDICINIANS, ATIPANTIANS, and CASSINIANS, he came to ROME with ensignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them rayse their feege, being so earnestly bent to winne CAPVA. This flying straight to ROME by cutters, they were so affrayd there, as ROME was neuer in the like feare it stood in then. For they saw their mortall enemy come to them with ensignes displayed, whome they had so often proued, almost to resist being absent, threatening to bring the Senate and people of ROME into subiection. So all ROME being in feare and tumult, it was ordeined that Fulsius Flaccus (one of the Consuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Consuls, Sulpicius Galba, and Cornelius Centimallus, should lye in campe out of the cite: and that C. Calpurnius Prætor, should put a stronge garrison into the capitol, and also that the Citizens that had borne any office or dignitie, should be appointed by their countenance and authoritie, to pacifie the sodaine tumults that might happen in the city. So Annibal marched forward without staying, till he came to the riuier of Anienes, and there camped within 24. furlong of ROME: and shortly after that, he came with two thousand horse to neare vnto ROME, that riding from the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leysure to view at his pleasure, the situacion and walles of so great a cite. Fulsius Flaccus seeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certen men of armes of the ROMANES against him: who coming with great furie to giue charge vpon him as they were commaunded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning, Annibal brought his army out of the campe, and did set them in battell raye, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The ROMANES on the other side did the like. So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and corage, that to see them, E they appeared men that feared no daunger, so they might obtaine the victorie that day. For on the one side, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in maner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battell, as beeing the last they should fight. The ROMANES in contrary manner, they were to fight for their contry, libertie, and their goods, to see whether they could keepe them, or that they should come to their enemies hands. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memorie. For, as they were ready set in battell raye, tarying but for the signal of battell to giue charge: there fell such a wonderful great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driuen in spight of their teethes, to bringe backe their army into their forts againe. The next day following in like manner, vnto the which it seemed the battell had bene deferred: when they had againe both of the set their men in battell raye, there fell the like storme vpon them, the which did as much hurt the ROMANES & CARTHAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to saue them selues, and not to thinke otherwise to fight. Annibal perceiving this, he turned to his friends and told them, that the first time he thought not to winne Rome, and that at the second time the occasion was taken from him. So there was a thinge that greatly troubled Annibal and that was this. That though he came so neare to Rome, with an army of horsemen and footemen: yet he heard that the ROMANES had sent ayde into SPAYNE, and that they had redeemed the contry where he had bene, at a farre greater prise then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmithes and bankers shoppes of the ROMANES citizens to be sold by the Cryer. But afterwards, casting with him selfe what a hard enterprise it was to take the citie of Rome, or els being affrayde to lacke vittells: (for he had stored him selfe only but for tenne dayes) he rayed his campe, and removing thence, came to the holy woode of the goddesse Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwards went thence into the contry of the BRYTIANES and LYCANIANES. The CAPYANES hauing intelligence thereof, being left out of all hope: they yelded vp their citie vnto the ROMANES. The citie of CAPYA being thus yelded vp, and brought againe to the subiection of the ROMANES, it was of great importance to all the people of ITALY, and withall brought a great desire of chaunge. Annibal him selfe also following euill counsell, did spoyle and destroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did sturre vp the harts of diuers nations against him. For where before when he was Conqueror, he had often let prisoners goe without ransom paying, through which liberalitie he had won the harts of many men: euen so at that present time, his barbarous crueltie made diuers cities (miskliking to be subiect to the CARTHAGINIANES) to rebell against him, and to take part with the ROMANES. Amongest them was SALAPIA, the which was yelded vp vnto the Consul Marcellus, by Blacius meanes, chiefe of all the ROMANES faction: and a band also of choyce horsemen which was left there in garrison, were in manner slaine every man of them. This is the citie where Annibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reprove his immoderat lust and lasciuiousnes. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continence of this Capitaine, say that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pint of wine, nether when he came to make warre in ITALY, nor after that he returned into AFRICK. Some there be also that say, Annibal was cruell, and vnconstant, and subiect to diuers such other vices: howbeit they make no manner of mention of his chastitie or incontinence. But they report that his wife was a SPANYARD, borne in CASTYLO, a good towne: and that the CARTHAGINIANES graunted her many things, and trusted her very much, because of the great faith and constancie of that nation. Now Annibal after he had lost (as we haue told you) the citie of SALAPIA: he found the meanes to cry quittance, and to make the ROMANES lose more then he had lost. For at the selfe same time, Fulvius Viceconsul, lay besieging of HERDONEYA, hoping to winne the citie without resistance. And because he stood in no feare of any enemy round about him, (for Annibal was gone into the contry of the BRYTIANES) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martiall affayres, contrary to the nature of the ROMANES Capitaines. Annibal being aduertised thereof by spials, would not lose such a goodly opportunity: and therefore comming into APVLLIA with his armye ready, he came so hastily vnto HERDONEYA, that he had almost stollen vpon Fulvius, vnprovidid in his campe. Howbeit the ROMANES valiantly receiued the first charge with such courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithstanding, in the ende, as the ROMANES two years before that had bene overcome not farre from thence, with their Consul Fulvius: euen so likewise vnder the conduct of this Fulvius Viceconsul, the ROMANES legions were vterly overthrowen, and their Capitaine slaine, with the most part of his armye. The Consul Marcellus was at that time in the citie of SAMNIVM, who being aduertised of this great overthrow, desired to be euen with him: and though it seemed he came too late to helpe things past remedie, yet he brought his army into the contry of the LYCANIANES, whether he vnderstood Annibal was gone after his victorie, and came and camped directly ouer against his enemye, and soone after came to battell. The which the CARTHAGINIANES refused not, but gaue such a fierce onser on either side, that they fought it out till Sunne set, and no man knew who had the better, and so the night parted them. The next morning the ROMANES shewing againe in field in battell raye, made it knownen that the enemies were affrayd of them: For Annibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following stole away without any noyse, and

A went into APVLLIA. Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and sought to put all to hazard by some notable battell: for he bare him selfe thus in hand, that of all the ROMANES Capitaines there was none machable with Annibal but him selfe, either in counsell, wit, or pollicie: or els in martiall discipline, or warlike stratagemes. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any set battell with the enemye: for after he had made adue light skirmishes, because he would not trouble his souldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed them in garrison for the winter time. At the beginning of the next springe, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Consuls for that yeare,) and partly also through his owne disposition: he brought out his garrisons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his army against Annibal, who lay at that time at CANVSIVM. Now it chanced, that through the bearenes of both their camps, and the good desire they both had to fight: in fewe dayes they fought three seuerall times. The first battell, when they had fought it out till night, in manner with like hope of both sides, and that it could not be iudged which of them had the better: they both of purpose retired into their campe againe. The second day Annibal was conquerer, after he had slayne almost two thousand seven hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to flight. The third day, the ROMANES to recouer the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before: they were the first that prayed they might fight, and so Marcellus led them out to battell. Annibal wondring at their valiantnes, sayd vnto his people: that he delt with an enemy that could neither be quiet Conqueror, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloody and cruell then any that was before: because the ROMANES did their best to be reuenged of their losse, and the CARTHAGINIANES on the other side were mad in their mindes, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquishers vnto battell. In the ende, the ROMANES being sharply reprocured, and also perswaded by Marcellus to stick to it valiantly like men, that the newes of their victorie might come to Rome, before the newes of their overthrow: they sue in among the presse of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrise broken their enemies, they made them all flee. At the selfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the citie of TARENTVM againe, almost after the selfe same sort it was lost. This being reported vnto Annibal, he sayd: the ROMANES haue also their Annibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus and Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put them selues in readines for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Annibal dispayring that he was not able to resist them in battell, he sought all the wits he had to deuise some way to intrappe them by subtiltie, where he could not overcome by batell. So Annibal's head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for. Betwene both camps, there was a pretty groue, in the which Annibal layed certain bands of the NYMIDIANES in ambushe, to intrappe the enemies passing to and fro. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if neede required: least in leauing it behind them, the enemies should come, & so be vpon their backs afterwards. Now before they removed their armye, both the Consuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsemen with them, to view the situation of this place: and so going on very vndiscreetly, and worse appoynted then became men of their authoritie & place, they vnfortunatly fell into Annibal's ambush. So, when they saw them selues in a momēt compassed about on euery side with enemies, that they could not goe forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended them selues the best they could, rather by compulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So Marcellus was slaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the other Consul also very sore hurt, who hardly escaped the enemies hands. Annibal being aduertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefe man of all the ROMANES capitaines, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, and had besides troubled him most: he presently went and camped there where the battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funeral. Hereby we may see how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are esteemed of all men: considering that the cruell and F most mortal enemye, gaue honorable buriall to so noble and excellent a Capitaine. The ROMANES in the meane time seeing one of their Consuls dead, and the other Consul very sore hurt: they drew straight to the next mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Cri-

Spinus had sent to the next townes of the mountaines, to advertise them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ringe he sealed his letters withall; wherefore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus Messenger came but newly vnto SALAPIA, when letters were brought also from Annibal in the behaile of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they sent his Messenger away, & carefully looked for Annibals coming. About the fourth watche of the night, Annibal came to the cite of SALAPIA, where of purpose had put all the ROMANES that had fled, in the vanguard, because that they speaking the Latin tongue, might make them beleue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the Citizens had suffred six hundred of them to come in, they shut to the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the armye, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the cite. Thus Annibal being in a marvelous rage he had misfed of his purpose: he removed thence, and went into the contry of the BRUTIANS, to ayde the LOCRIANS that were befegged by the ROMANES, both by sea and by land. After all these thinges, at the earnest request of the Senate and people, two new Consuls were created, both famous Captaines, and valiant fouldiers, Marcius Linius, & Claudius Nero: who hauing deuised the army betwixt them, went vnto their severall charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the contry of the SALENTINIANS, and M. Linius into GAYLE, against Hasturbal BARCEINIAN, who was come ouer the Alpes, & made haste to ioyne with his brother Annibal, bringing with him a great army both of footemen and horsemen. Nowe it chaunced at the same time, that Annibal had receyved great losse by Claudius the Consul. For first of all, he ouercame him in the contry of the LVCANIANS, vying the like policies and fetches that Annibal did. Afterwardes againe, meeting with Annibal in APVLTIA, by the cite of VENVSTIA: he fought such a lusty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the fildes. By reason of these great losses, Annibal sodainly went to METAPONT, to renew his army againe. So hauing remayned there a few dayes, he receiued the army from Hanno, the which he ioynd vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSTIA. C. Nero lay not farre from VENVSTIA with his campe: who hauing intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderstoode by them that Hasturbal was at hand with his armye. Thereupon, he bethought him selfe night and day, what policie he might vie to preuent the ioyning of two so great armies together as these. So after he had taken aduise of him selfe, he followed in sight, a dangerous determination: but peradventure necessary, as the time required. For, leauing the campe vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he tooke part of the armye with him, and making great iorneyes, came to PICENVM (being the marches of ANCONA) so that on the sixth day he came to SENA. There both the Consuls ioynd their forces together, and setting vpon Hasturbal by the riuier of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were six and fifty thousand of the enemies slayne on that daye: so that they almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the ROMANES had receiued before at the battell of CANNES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victorie, returning as speedily vnto VENVSTIA as he went thence, he set vp Hasturbals head, where the enemies kept their watche: and did let certain prisoners goe, to carye newes to Annibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwardes it was knowne, that Annibal knew nothing yet of Claudius secret enterprise, nor of the speedy execution and great slaughter he had made. Wherefore I can but wonder, that so fustill a Capitaine as Annibal, could be deceived by Claudius, considering both their campes lay so neare together: so that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and all his armye, before he vnderstoode any thing of the Consuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Annibal hauing not onely receiued a generall, but also a particular great losse by the death of his brother: he sayd then he plainly saw the chaunge & alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune, and shortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the contry of the BRUTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow giuen by the riuier of Metaurum, was a marvelous incouragement to the ROMANES, and would also be a great logge in his way, for the successe of all this warre. This notwithstanding, he gathered together all his power he had left in ITALY, after so many great battells and conflicts, and so many cities taken: and mainteyned the warre with an inuincible courage. But the most straungest thinge in Annibal

The chaunge and alteration of the Carthaginians good fortune.

A was this, that through his authoritye as wife doer, he kept all his army in peace and amitie together, being a meeting of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAYLES, and of diuers other nations; and neuer man heard that there was any brawle or tumult amonge them. Howbeit the ROMANES them selues, after they had inuonne SICILIA, SARDINIA, and SPAYNE againe, they could neuer utterly ouersome him, nor driue him out of ITALY, before they had sent Scipio into AFRICK: who making warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, he brought them to such great extremities, that they were driuen to send for Annibal home, out of ITALY. Annibal at that time, (as I haue sayd before) was in the contry of the BARBARIANS, making warre by inuades and sodaine inuasions, rather then by any fought battell: saying that once he had a battell fought in haste betwixt him and the Consul Sempronius, and immediately after he came and set vpon the same Sempronius with all his armye. At the first battell, Annibal had the victorie: but at the second, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can finde in no Greek nor Latin Author, that Annibal did any famous acte in ITALY, worthy memorie. For beinge sent for into AFRICK by the CARTHAGINIANS, he left ITALY, sixteen years after this AFRICK warre was begonne, greatly complaining of the Senate of CARTHAGE, and of him selfe also. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had bene in his enemies contry so long, they had allowed him so little money: and so scantred him besides with all other thinges necessary for the warres: And of him selfe, because that after he had so often ouercome the ROMANES, he had alwayes delayed time after the victorie, and had giuen the enemy libertie to gather force againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarked andooke sea, he set vp a triumphing archer or pillar, by the temple of Iuuo Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his publick victories, both in the Punick and Graek tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind serued him well, that in few dayes he arrived at LEPTIS, and landing all his army, he first came to ADRYMENTVM, and afterwardes vnto ZAMA. There receiuing aduisement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS prospered: he thought it best to deuise some way to end this warre. For this cause he sent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoynt him some conuenient place where they might both meete, and take together, of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainly knowne, whether Annibal did this of his owne head, or by commaundement from the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appoynted, there met two famous generalls of mighty nations, in a great plain together, either of them hauing his Interpreter, to talke together of diuers matters touching peace and warre. For, Annibal was altogether bent to peace: because he saw the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS were worse & worse every day: that they had lost SICILIA, SARDINIA, and SPAYNE: because the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICK: because Syphax (a mighty king) was taken prisoner of the ROMANES: and also because that their last hope consisted in the army he had brought into ITALY: and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small a power left (both of strangers, and also of Citizens) that there were scarce men enough to defende the cite of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio, with a long oration he made, rather to agree to peace, then to reloue of warre. Howbeit Scipio that liued in hope to bring this warre to a good end, he would not seeme to giue care to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either side, in the end they brake of, and made no agreement. Shortly after, was this famous battell striken by the cite of ZAMA, in the which the ROMANES obayned victorie. For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, so that they did put all Annibals horsemen out of order. And Lelium and Admissus, who made both the wings, increasing their feare, gaue the horsemen no leysure to gather them selues in order againe. Howbeit the footemen fought it out a long time, & with a marvelous great cotage: in so much that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former victories) thought that all the safetie and preservation of AFRICK, was all in their hands; and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMANES on the other side had as great hartes as they, and besides, they stood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing in deece did the ROMANES: great seruite to helpe them to the victorie: and that was, Lelium and Admissus returned from the chase of the horsemen, who rushed in to the battell of the enemy with great surge; and did put them in a maruelous feare. For at their coming, the CARTHAGINIANS harts were done, and they saw no other remedie for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slayne that day about twenty thousand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more prisoners. Annibal their generally, after he had tarried to see the ende of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great slaughter. Afterwardes when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to saue his contry: he perswaded the Senate not to hope any more in warres, but did counsell them, that setting all besides a party, they should send vnto Scipio the ROMAN Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ROMAN Ambassadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto CARTHAGE of the articles of peace, it is reported that there was one Gisco, who mistaking to heare talke of peace; he made annoy, and perswaded all he could to renew warre against the ROMANES. Wherefore Annibal perceiving that diuers men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to see such beautes, and men of no vnderstanding, so dare to speake of such matters, in so daungerous a time: he cast him downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his oration. So when he sawe that the Citizens, and all the whole assembly, thought this too presumptuous a part of him, & vnmeetie altogether for a free citie: he him selfe got vp into the pulpit for orations, and sayd, Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth hath bene alway out of CARTHAGE, & brought vp all his life time in warres, be ignoraunt of the lawes and ordinances of the citie. After that, he spake so wisely to the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediately moued by the authoritie of so great a person: they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offered them. The articles out of doubt were very extreame, and such as the vanquished are wont to receiue with all extremitie by the conquerors. But besides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMANES an annuall tribute, vntill a certain time were runne out. So when the daye came that the first pention was to be paid to the ROMANES, and that euery man grudged when the subsidey was spoken of: some saye that Annibal being offended, with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS; he fell a laughing. And when Hannibal had reproued him because he laughed in such a common calamitie of all the citie, he answered: that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the hart, but a scorning of thei fond teares; that wept when there was lesse cause (and onely because it touched euery private mans purse) then before, when the ROMANES tooke from the CARTHAGINIANS their shippes, armor, and weapons, and their spoyles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinances vnto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write, that Annibal immediately after he had lost the battell, fled into ASIA, for that he was affrayde they would deliuer him into Scipios hands, that perhaps might demand him of them. But whether that was done sodainly, or some time after the battell was lost at ZAMA, it makes no great matter: considering that all the world knoweth, that when he sawe things brought to extremitie, he presently fled into ASIA vnto king Antiochus. So is it most true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great curtesie, and vsed him very honorably: in so much as he made him of counsell with him all in all, both in private and publick caufes. For the name of Annibal caried great reputation with all men besides that, he had a common and mortal hate to the ROMANES, which was a pricking spur to moue warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hower into that contry, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king against them, but also to set warres at libertie against the ROMANES. So he tolde him, that the onely way to make warre, with the ROMANES, was to goe into ITALY to leauy ITALIAN souldiers, by whome onely that victorious contry of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred shippes, sixteene thousand footemen, and a thousand horsemen onely. With this small army he promised to inuade ITALY, and that he would maruelously trouble the ITALYANS, whome he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very found of his name onely: because of the late warres he had made there, so frese yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke hart againe vnto him to renew the warres of AFRICA, if the king would licence him to sende men vnto CARTHAGE, to stirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whome he knew hated the ROMANES to death. When he had gotten the king to graunt him his request, he called Arifon

A TYRIAN vnto him, a fine suttell fellowe, and meete for such a purpose: to whome he made large promises, and perswaded him to goe to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to cary them letters from him. Thus Annibal being a banished man, and fled out of his contry, rayled warre in all partes against the ROMANES. And surely his counsell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduise, as he did at the first, then the vaine perswasions of his fine Courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Annibal great enemies. For they being affrayd that by his counsells he should growe in great fauor with the king (for he was a wise and politike Captaine) and that thereby he should beare great sway and authoritie: to prevent it, they lacked no deuise to bringe him in disgrace with the king. And it so chanced at that time, that P. Villius, who came Ambassador vnto EPHEVS, he had often conference with Annibal. Hereuppon his priuie enemies tooke occasion to accuse him, and withall, the king him selfe became so ielous of it, that from thence forth he neuer more called him to counsell. At the selfe same time also, as some doe report, P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN (who was one of the Ambassadors sent vnto king Antiochus) talking familiarly with Annibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whome he thought the worthiest Captaine of all others. Annibal answered him. First he thought Alexander, king of MACEDON the chieft: next vnto him, Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES; and thirdly, him selfe. Then Scipio AFRICAN smyling, asked him: what wouldst thou saye, Annibal, if thou haddest ouercome me? Truly sayd he, then I would be chieft my selfe. This answer pleased Scipio maruelous well, because he saw he was neither dispised, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peereles, by some secret flattery of Annibal. After these things, Annibal found occasion to talke with king Antiochus, and beganne to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, and to bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the ROMANES: whereby he so satisfied the king, that he was againe receiued into his grace and fauor, which he had almost vtterly lost. Thereuppon the king was determined to haue made him Admirall of his armye by sea, the which he had put in readines for ITALY, and also to make prooue of his great corage and seruice, whome he knewe to be a worthy man, and a mortall enemy to the ROMANES. But one Thoon, Prince of the ETOLIANS, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or els for that his fancy was such: he altered the kinges minde, and cleane changed his purpose, the which was a matter of greate importance for the warre he pretended to make. For he gaue counsell vnto Antiochus, that he should goe him selfe into GRECE, and direct his owne affayres: and that he should not suffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this warre. So king Antiochus shortly after went into GRECE, to make warre with the ROMANES. Within fewe dayes after, when he consulted whether he should make league with the THESSALIANS, Annibals opinio was specially asked: who spake so wisely touching the state of the THESSALIANS, & the chieft matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, and gaue their consents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they should not neede much to care for the THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the meanes they could, to get king Philip of MACEDON to take their part: or els to perswade him to be a Newter, and to take neither parte. Furthermore, he gaue counsell to make warre with the ROMANES in their owne contry, & offered him selfe to ayde him the best he could. Euery man gaue good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather comended, then followed. Wherefore euery man maruelled, that such a Captaine as he, that had so many yeares made warre with the ROMANES (who had in manner conquered all the world) should then be so light set by of the king, when it specially stood him vpon, to haue such a mans help & coufel. For, what captaine liuing could a man haue found more skilful or politike, or meter to make war with the ROMANES, then him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him, at the first beginning of this warre: but shortly after, disdaining at their counsell, he confessed that Annibal only saw what was to be done. For after the ROMANES had obtained victory in the war he made in GRECE: Antiochus fled out of EUROPE into EPHEVS, where making mery, & there following pleasure, he hoped to liue in peace, little thinking the ROMANES would come with any army into ASIA. Now, these flattering courtiers still fed his humora: perpetual plague to kings & Princes, that suffer them selues to be flattered, & are contented to be deceiued, because they giue good eare to that that pleaseth them. But Annibal, who knewe the power and ambition of the ROMANES, perfwaded the king A to hope for any thing rather then peace, and bad him truft to it, that the ROMANES would neuer ftay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, and EVROPE. Antiochus perfwaded by the authority of fuch a man, ftraight commaunded Polyxenidas, a very feruiceable man, and skillfull in fea feruice, that he fhould goe meeete with the army of the ROMANES that was comming thither. Then he fent Annibal into SYRIA, to leauy a great number of fhippes together, and afterwards made him, and Apollonius, (one of his fauored Courtiers) generalls of this armye by fea: who notwithstanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worft by the ROMANES, they went and fet vpon the RHODIANS, that were confederats with them. Annibal in this battell affaying Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left wing: he had already compaffed in the Admirall galley, and doubtles had obtaigned the victorie, but that the other wing came in to refcue, after they had followed Apollonius in chafe, and tooke the victorie from him, that was his owne. After this battell by fea, which had no great good fuccesse: we doe not find that Annibal did any thing worthy memorie. For king Antiochus being overcome, befides other condicions, the ROMANES offered him: they desired that Annibal (the mortall enemy of their contry) fhould be deliuered vnto them. Annibal forefeeing this long before, he fodainely ftale from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrowen. So, after Annibal had wandered vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Prusias, king of BITHYNIA, for fuccor. Nowe he did not fo much truft to his friend fhippe, but bicaufe he fought for the meeeteft place he coulde come by, as alfo for the fafeft, the which he moft defired: confidering that the ROMANES had the moft part of the fea and land in their fubiection. Some fay, that after king Antiochus was overcome, Annibal went into CRETAVnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumor ranne immediately, he had brought a great mafle of gold and filuer with him. Wherefore being affrayd leaft the CRETANS fhould offer him fome violence, he deuifed this fhifte to fcape the danger. he filled earthen pots with lead, gilt, and fent them into the temple of Diana, faying that he was maruelous carefull for them, as though all his treafure had bene there. On the other fide he had hid all his gold in images of braffe, the which he had left carefly lying on the ground in the houfe. In the meane time, whileft they watched the temple carefully, that thefe earthen pots fhould not be caried away without their priuitie: Annibal hoysed fayle, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the fea fide, which the contry men call LIBYSSA, of the which by fome mens faying, there ranne an olde oracle and prophecy in this fort.

The land of Libyssa shall cover vnder morouide

The valliant corps of Annibal, when he is dead and colde.

There Annibal lay, not fpending his time idly, but paffing it away in exercifing of the mayrners, riding of hories, and trayning of his fouldiers. Some Authors alfo do write, that at that time Prusias made warre with Eumenes, king of PERGAMYM, who was a confederate and friend of the ROMANES: and that he made Annibal his Lieutenant generall of his army by feawho affaying Eumenes with a new found and vnknown deuife, wanne the victory of the battell by fea. For before they began to fight, it is reported that Annibal had gorten an infinite number of fnakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begonne, and they bufily tending their fight: he threw thofe pots with fnakes into the enemies fhippes, and that by this fearefull and ftraunge deuife he made them flee. Now whether this was true or not, the olde chronicles do make no manner of mention, but only AEmilius and Trogus. And therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diffention betwixt thefe two kings, (Prusias, and Eumenes) being brought to ROME: the Senate fent T. Q. Flaminius Ambaffador into ASIA, whole name was famous for the noble victories he had obtaigned in GREECE, to the ende (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt thefe two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Prusias, he was marueloufly offended, and fory in his mind to fee Annibal yet aliue, (that was the mortall enemy of the ROMANES) after the coquefts of fo many nations, & the facking of fo many people: therefore, he was very earnestly in hand with king Prusias to deliuer him Annibal. Annibal from the fift beginning miftrufled king Prusias in confancancy very much, and therefore had digged diuers

A diuers vaults in his houfe, and made feuen feuerall vents to flic out at, if he were fodainely taken. The report of Flaminius coming did encrease his fufpition the more, for that he thought him the greateft enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all the ROMANES, as alfo particularly for the remembrance of his father Flaminius, that was flayne in the battell fought by the lake of Thralymene. So Annibal being full of care and grieue (as it is reported) he found deuifes to efcape, the which ftood him to no purpofe againft fuch a great power. For when the kings gard which were fent to take him, had copafed his houfe about Annibal thought to flic at their fift coming, and to faue him felfe by the feccereft vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the gard, then he determined to rid him felfe out of the ROMANES handes, by deftroying him felfe. So, fome doe report, that he was ftrangled by one of his men, whome he had commaunded to helpe to difpatche him. Others write againe, that he had droncke bulles bloud, and when he had droncke it, dyed, as Clitarachus, and Stratocles doe falſely report of Themiftoles. Howbeit Titus Livius, that famous Hiftoriographer writeth, that Annibal called for the poyfon he had ready for fuch a mifchiefe, and that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke he fayd: Come on lets rid the ROMANES of this payne and care, fith their fpirit and malice is fo great, to haften the death of a poore old man that is halfe dead already. The ancient ROMANES aduertifed Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES, who came with enſignes displayed to the very walls of the citie of ROME, that he fhould looke to him felfe, and beware of poyſoning: and the ROMANES nowe doe make a friends forgetting his kingly ftate and faithfull promife, viley to betraye his poore gheft. After he had fayd, bitterly curſing king Prusias, he poyſoned him felfe, being three ſcore & tence year old, as ſome writers doe teſtifie. His body was buried in a tombe of ſtone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engrauen no more but this: Here lyeth Annibal. The ROMANES being aduertifed of his death, euery man fayde his opinion, as his fancye ferued him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius crueltie, who to make him felfe famous by ſome notable acte, (as he thought) made a poore olde man put him felfe to death, that was in manner halfe dead by age, and befides, was paſt doing the ftate of ROME any more hurt, they being Conquerors in manner of all the world. But ſome againe on the other fide, commended Flaminius for it, & fayd it was a good deede of him, to rid the ROMANES of their mortall enemy: who thought he had but a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wife counſell, and great experience in warres, to intife king Prusias to make warre, and to moleſt all ASIA befides with newe warres. For at that time, the power of the king of BITHYNIA was fo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the ſame BITHYNIA, did maruelouſly moleſt the ROMANES both by fea and by land, & moreover fought battells with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMANES. And ſo the ROMANES might alfo be affrayd of king Prusias, and ſpecially hauing Annibal his Captaine. So ſome iudge, that Q. Flaminius was ſpecially ſent Ambaffador vnto king Prusias, ſecretly to praſtife Annibals death. Howbeit it is to be ſuppoſed, that Q. Flaminius was not ſo delirious to haue Annibal fo ſodainely put to death, as he would haue bene glad otherwiſe to haue brought him againe to ROME, that had done ſuch miſchiefe to his contry: and this had bene a great benefit for ROME, and much honor alſo vnto him felfe. Such was the death of Annibal the CARTAGINIAN, a famous man doubtles, & highly to be commended for martiall prayfe, ſetting his other vertues aſide. So we may eaſily iudge, of what power and force his noble mind, his great wiſdom and corage, and his perfect skill of martiall diſcipline was in all things. For in all the warre the CARTAGINIANS had ſo vehemently, and with ſuch great preparation enterpriſed: they neuer thought them ſelues overcome, till Annibal was ouerthrowen at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth, that all their ſtrength and ſkill of warres began, & alſo ended, with Annibal their Captaine.

THE LIFE OF Scipio African.

The passage of Scipio.

Publius Scipio a PATRICIAN of the family of the Corneli, who was the first ROMANE Capitaine against whom Annibal fought in ITALY was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards surnamed AFRICANUS, the first so called, because he had conquered that nation. The same Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in SPAYNE, and done notable feates of armes: was in the ende slayne with a wound he had in a battell against his enemies, as he was plying and incouraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greatest daunger and fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio also ende his life, much after one selfe manner, and was slayne valiantly fighting. So these two Captaines, besides the same they achieved by their noble deedes, left behind them great prayse of their faithfulness, modestie, and courage: the which made them not onely wished for of their fouldiers that were then living, but also of all the SPANYARDS besides. Cn. Scipio had a sonne called P. Cornelius Nasica, one that had bene Consul and had also triumphed: who being but a younge man, was thought the meekest man of all the citie of ROME to receyue the mother of the goddess. This Publius had two sonnes, the so famous Scipio: of the which the one was called ASIAN, because he conquered ASIA: and the other AFRICANUS, because he subdued AFRICA at that famous battell of ZAMA, where he overthrew Annibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we sayd before. Whose life we purpose nowe to write, not so much to make the glory of his name (so famous by all the Graeke & Latyn Authors) the greater by our story as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deedes, & moral vertues, so that all Princes & noble Captaines in reading it should behold the lively image of perfect vertue, which may moue an earnest desire in the to follow the example of P. Cornelius Scipio's life, who from his childhood gaue great hope & shew of a noble nature, & excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, under the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the second warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, the campe being but leuenteene yeare old, & in a very short time grew so toward, & forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all manner of paynes like a soldier, that he was great commendation of his own father, & besides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit, & noble courage: that it made him beloued, & also feared of his

A his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul fought with Annibal, by the river of Thefin: & some writers doe affirme, that Cornelius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemy, had not his sonne Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so young. After that also, at the battell that was fought by CANNES, to the great losse, & in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of ROME, when the ten thousand men that fled to CANUSIVM, had all together with one consent reserued the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Edilis, and vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young: the same Scipio shewed then by his deedes, what noble mind and courage was in him. For when he saw certain young men consil: together betwene them selues to forsake ITALY: he thrust in among them, & drawing out his sword, made them all sweare they would not forsake their contry. These, and such like deedes done by him with a liuely corage & noble mind, being then but a young man: wanne him such fauor with the ROMANES, that not respecting his young yeares, nor their auncient cust, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge & gouernment vpon him. In so much that when he sued for the office of Edilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his sute, because he was so younge a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, & so was presently chosen Edilis with the most voyces. So after his father & Vncle, (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene slaine one after the other in SPAYNE, & that the ROMANES were in consultation to appoynt some worthy captaine in the roome: they could finde no man that durst vnder take this so daungerous warre, considering the losse of two so great captaines before. Wherefore the whole assably being called to choole a Viceconsul, all the other Princes & peeres of the Realme being silent at so worthy a motion: Scipio onely of all the rest, being but foure & twenty yeare old, stood vp in the middle of the th, & said, with a good hope & confidence he would willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no sooner offered this promise, but he was presently made Viceconsul of SPAYNE, with the wonderful good will & fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voyces. Howbeit the Senators afterwards considering better of the matter, against what captaines & natiōs he should make warre: they thought it vnpossible so younge a man could performe so waighy a charge. Wherefore mens minds were wonderfully chaunged againe on the sodeine, as if the wibes of the people had repented them of their voyces & election. Scipio perceiving it, called an assembly presently, & made such an oration of his age, and discipline of warres, that euery man that heard him wondered at him, & the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not onely a noble corage in him, being induted with many singular vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, & very comly of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to winne him the loue and good will of euery man. Moreover, euen in his gesture and behavior, there was a certaine princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline, being ioyned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature: it was to be doubted, whether his ciuill vertues made him more acceptable vnto straungers, then wonderful for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples hearts with a certain superstitious feare, because he did daily (after he had take the mans E gowne) vse to goe vp to the Capitoll, & so into the church without any company: in so much that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nympe AEgeria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in olde time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wete: that oftentimes there was a snake scene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten thousand footemen, & a flecte of thirty galleys, euery one of the hauing fise owers to a bank he sailed into SPAYNE, & in few dayes arriuing at EMPORIA, he landed his men, and marched by land to TERRA CON. There he kept a counsell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their confodorats came thither, who being curteously receyued, returned to their lodgings with such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the warre, he had taken vpon him, he thought it best to ioyne the remayne of the olde bandes with his army, which had bene saued through the manhood and valiantnes of Lucius Martius. For after

P. Scipio reserued his father from being taken of the enemies.

The valiant

Martius a Romane

both the Scipios were slayne, and both SPAYNES almost lost, and the ROMANE legions also ouerthrowen and put to flight: L. Martius a ROMANE Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glory of the victorie they had gotten, and with great valiantnes, and vnspokeable industry he main-teyned warre in SPAYNE, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being comen to this army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainly perswade them felues that the warre should prosper: and when they sawe him, they remembered their old Captaines, inasmuch that there was neuer a fouldier could haue his fill, with looking vp on this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the fouldiers for their noble courage, not dispayring for the calamitie of their contry: he greatly honored Lucius Martius, so shewe, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, neede not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being past, he rooke the old and new bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to goe and lay siege vnto new CARTHAGE. For of all the cities of SPAYNE it was the wealthiest, and none more meete to make warre both by sea & land, then that. Moreover, the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this citie all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the citie, and castel. But the Captaines them felues were de-uided in diuers contries, to the end that they three might kepe the whole region from spoile, least of all looking then that CARTHAGE should be beleeged. So Scipio hauing put all in readiness, he came to beleegge new CARTHAGE with all his army both by sea and land. This seemed to be a maruelous hard enterpryse, and would continue long, both because the citie was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within it were so coragious: that they did not onely thinke them felues able to defend the citie, but their hearts serued them also to make salyes out vpon the enemye, and to skirmish with them, euen to the very trenches of the ROMANES campe. Howbeit it happeneth often, that what a man can not attaine by force, he may winne by industrie. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or mer which is not farre from the walls of CARTHAGE, did ebbe and flowe with the tyde, and that it was passable by forde on that side where they might easiliest come to the walles: So, he thinking to imbrace this occasion, and that he could not possibly meete with a better deuise to take CARTHAGE when he saw his time, he set his meyn battell ray, and hauing deuided them into seuerall squadrons, gaue a more desperat assault vnto the citie, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valiantest men he had, and commaunded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the walles on that side, where they within the towne made least accompt of it. So, these fouldiers that were commaunded to giue this attempt, after they had passed ouer the lake without any let or trouble: they found that part of the wall without any watche or garde, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the citie. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wal, came and assailed the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of the garrison, perceyuing they were vnwares fallen into that great daunger: they immediately forsooke the walles, and seeing them felues charged on euery side, berooke them to their legges, and fled. The ROMANES pursued them so hottely, that they wanne the citie, and sacked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoyle, and abundance of all things necessary for warre. Scipio greatly prayed his fouldiers, & did reward them, for that they had done so valiant seruice. Howbeit when he should come to giue the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that got vp vpon the wall: there were two fouldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the army was in danger of diuision and mutinie vpon that occasion. Theruppon Scipio called his men together, and in open assembly told them, that he knewe they both got vp on the wall together, and so gaue them both a scaling crowne: & by this means their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he sent vnto all the cities of SPAYNE, the hostages that were found in the city, which were a maruelous number: the which wanne him great fame for his curtesie and clemency, whereby he allured many nations to yeld them felues vnto the ROMANES, and to forsake the CARTHAGINIANS. But one thinge aboue all the rest, chiefly increased his prayse, and wanne him great loue and good will, as a myrror and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady taken prisoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in CARTHAGE: whome he carefully caused to be kept, and preserved from violence and dishonor. And afterwards when he knew that

clemencie of Scipio.

A that he was married vnto Lucius, Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: he sent for her husbande that was a verie young man, and deliuered her vnto him, vntoucht, or dishonored. Lucius not forgetting his noble curtesie vnto her, did let all his subiects vnderstand the great bounty, modestie, and rare excellencie of all kinde of vertues that were in this ROMANE Generall: and shortly after he returned againe to the ROMANES campe, with a great number of horsemen. The three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago, Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Hafdrubal, the sonne of Gisco) knowing that the losse of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other strange nations, as also by the coniecture diuers made of the successe of this warre: they first practised to dissemble the losse of it, and then in speech to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio hauing ioined vnto him diuers B nations and Princes of SPAYNE, (among the which were the two lide kings, Mandonius, and Indibilis) vnderstanding where Hafdrubal BARCINIAN lay: he marched towards him with his C amie, to fight with him, before Mago and the other Hafdrubal came to ioine with him. Hafdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the riuier of Besula, & was verie desirous to fight, trusting wholly to his strength and army. But when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of pretie strength. The ROMANE legions followed him, and gaue him no respite, but pursued so neere, that they came and assaulted his campe at their first coming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampers, as if they had bene at the assault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIANS trusting to the strength of the place, and drinen vnto it of necessitie, (the which maketh cowards most desperat) they valiantly resisted their enemies the best they D could. The ROMANES in contrarie maner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out lustily like men, and the fight was so muche more cruell, for that it was in the sight of their Generall Scipio, and of all the amie besides: insumch that their valiant seruice there could not be hidden. Therefore they neuer gaue ouer the assault, vntill that hauing done their ver-E tuermost endeuor, they got vp vpon the rampers, and entred in diuers places into the enemies campe, and made them flee. Hafdrubal, Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, saved him selfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMANES entred into their fort. After this battell, Scipio according to his maner, caused all the spanish prisoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart, without paying of ranfome. Among the prisoners, there was a young gentleman of the kings blood, and nephew vnto Masimissa, whom when he had D vied verie honorably, he sent vnto Masimissa, with great and rich gifts: to shew thereby, that a Generall of an army should be as bountifull & full of ciuill vertues, as otherwise skilfull & expert in martiall discipline. For the ende of warre is victorie: the benefite whereof consisteth in bounty, and clemencie. From thence commeth the glorie and all other praifes due to Captaines: as it happened in those things whereof we now treat. For a great number of SPAN-YARDS being present, wondering at the great clemencie of the Generall of the ROMANES, they E coule doe no lesse but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio brake that word dead straight, the which was no common found to the ROMANES estates, and therefore he would by no means allow that title, which he knewe to be hurtfull to the noble men of his contrie, and also vnmeet for the libertie of the ROMANES. He onely prayed the SPAN-YARDS, that if they had any mind & desire not to shew them felues vnthankfull to him, that F then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of ROME. So whilst these things were done by Scipio, the other two Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago and Hafdrubal, the sonne of Gisco) after they vnderstoode of the ouerthrowe of their men by the riuier of Besula: they made all the speede they could to ioine together, and shortly after came and met with Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, to consult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and considered all things, they concluded thus: that Hafdrubal BARCINIAN should goe into ITALIE to his brother Annibal, where the warre was greatest: and that Mago, and the other Hafdrubal should remaine in SPAYNE, should sende for aide from CARTHAGE, & should not fight with the ROMANES vntill all their forces looked for were assembled, and so might make a great and puissant armie. When Hafdrubal was gone into ITALIE, Hanno was sent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practising in his iorney to make the CELTIBERIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and set vpon him by Scipios commaundement, and was fo fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prifoner. Nowe there was a citie which the contrie men called O R I N G E, the which was verie wealthie, and meete to renewe the warre. Lucius Scipio was fent thither with parte of the armie to befiege it: but finding it a verie strong Ictuation, and too well manned to take it at the firft affault, he emburronned the towne, and within few dayes tooke and lacked it. Winter came on a pace, and the time of the yeare made them both to retire into their gartillos for the winter. So Scipio hauing had fo good fortune in this warre, he went vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hafdrubal, the sonne of Giffo, went to the fea fide. The next fommer, warres growing more bloody and cruell then before in the lower SPAYNE, the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the riuier of Befula, and fought fet battells. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victorie, & made the enemies fle: (of the which there were flaine a great number in the field) and geuing them no leaſure to gather together againe, and to make head againſt him, he fought with them, and followed the chafe fo hottely, that Hafdrubal and Mago were driuen to leaue the maine land, and to fle to GADES, after they had loſt all their armie. In the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble courage, and verie wiſe, called Mafiniſſa, who finding meanes to haue ſecret conference with Syllanus, he was the firſt man that offered him friendſhippe, either being brought to it through Scipio's liberalitie, or elſe becauſe he thought the time was come, that it was the ſureſt way to take part with the ROMANES, which were the conquerors. It is that Mafiniſſa that afterwards, (through the goodnes of the ROMANES) became the great and mighty king of NUMIDIA, and in deede he was diuers wayes a profitable frende vnto the ROMANES. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame yeare, (which was the fourteenth of the ſeconde warre with the AFRICANS) SPAYNE was the firſt nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the hart of the realme, that was conquered vnder the happie conſult of the Viceconſul Scipio: howbeit it was the laſt realme that was made a province long time after, by Auguſtus Caſar. Now Scipio not contenting him ſelf with the great victories he had obtained, in verie ſhort time in SPAYNE (for he had an imagination & good hope alſo to cōquer AFRICK) he thought that his beſt way, to make all the meanes he could poſſible to get Syphax, king of the MASESYLIANS, a friend to the ROMANES. Wherefore after he had felt the kinges minde, perceiving that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMANES: he preſently ſet all his other affaires aſide, and failed into AFRICK with two gallies onely, at five owers to a bancke. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo came Hafdrubal, the ſonne of Giffo thither, from GADES: ſo that both theſe valliant & luſty Captaines came of purpoſe to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kinges good will, vnto their contrie and common wealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did viſe them verie honorably and curteouſly, and appointed that they ſhould both eate at one table, and lye in one ſelfe chamber, becauſe the one ſhoulde not thinke his entertainment better then the other. It is reported, that Hafdrubal wondering at the magnanimity and great wiſedom of Scipio that was preſent, he conſidered with him ſelfe the great danger the citie of CARTHAGE and all AFRICK beſides was in, through that mans meanes: for he ſaw him yet a young man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continuallie obtained ſuch victories, and therefore conſidering the luſtie youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it was vnpoſſible to perſwade him to embrace peace, rather then warre. Beſides, he was affraid alſo that Syphax, moued by the perſonage and authoritie of him that was preſent, would take parte with the ROMANES: and in deede his minde gaue him rightlie, for ſo it happened. For though Syphax at the firſt ſhewed him ſelfe indifferent to them both, and had moued talke to end the warre betwixt the ROMANES and the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio tolde him he coulde conclude no peace without conſent of the Senate of ROME, here he offered Hafdrubal, and inclining to Scipio's requeſt, he made league with the people of ROME. So Scipio being returned againe into SPAYNE, him ſelfe partly by force, and partly alſo by L. Martius meanes, conquered LLITVRGIUM, CASTULO, and certaine other places that refuſed to yeeld them ſelues vnto the ROMANES. And to the end nothing ſhould be lacking for all kinde of ſports and pleaſures, after he had ſo fortunatelie obtained ſo many famous victories: when he was come to newe CARTHAGE, he cauſed the ſenſers to prepare them ſelues to fight with

A great pompe, where there were many great eſtates, not only to ſee that paſſime, but alſo they them ſelues to handle the weapons in perſon. But amongſt other SPANYARDS of noble houſes, there were two called, Corbui, & Orſia, which were at liſt together for the kingdom: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being flaine by the others hand. The fight was verie lamentable & grievous to the beholders: but the death of him that was flaine, troubled them much more, for they were both couſin germaines. After all this, Scipio hauing his mind full occupied in matters of greater waight and importance, then thoſe which he had alreadie brought to paſſe: he fell ſicke. His ſickenes being caried through all SPAYNE, and as it happened often, his diſeaſe being reported to be muche greater and dangerous then it was in deede: thereupon, not only the nations of SPAYNE beganne to riſe in hope of change, but the armie ſelfe alſo of the ROMANES, the which he had left at SVERO. Firſt of all, martiall diſcipline was corrupted, through the abſence of the Generall. Afterwards alſo, the report of his ſickenes, and danger of his life being ſpred abroad in the armie, raiſed ſuche a rebellion among them: that ſome of them liſt regarding the authoritie and commandement of the head Captaines of the bands, they draue them away, and choſe two meane ſouldiers for their Captaines, who preſumptuouſly tooke vpon them the name geuen vnto them by men of no authority, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundells of rodde and axes to be caried before them. Such follie doth furie and vaſe ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other ſide, the SPANYARD ſlept not, and ſpecially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aſpiring to the kingdom of SPAYNE, came to Scipio when he was conqueror, after he had taken newe CARTHAGE. But afterwards, being offended to ſee the power of the ROMANES increaſed daily, they fought occaſion to make ſome alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipio's ſickenes, but alſo how he was at deathes dore, and did beleue it: they preſentlie leauied an armie, and went and made warre with the SVBSSITANS which were confederates of the ROMANES. But Scipio being recovered againe of his ſickenes, like as vpon the falſe rumor of his death euery man beganne to riſe: euen ſo after the truth was known in deede of his recoverie, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durſt proceede any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more ſkilfull in martiall diſcipline, then acquainted with ſedition and rebellion: although he was maruelouſly offended with the ſouldiers that had committed this follie, yet in the end, leaſt following his anger, men ſhould haue thought him to haue executed all boundes of reaſon in puniſhing of them, he referred all vnto the counſell. The moſt parte of them gaue aduiſe, that the authors of the rebellion ſhoulde be puniſhed, and all the reſt pardoned: for by this meanes ſayd they, the puniſhment ſhall light vpon a few that haue deſerued it; and all the reſt ſhall take example by them. Scipio followed that aduiſe, and preſently ſent for all the ſeditious bandis to come to new CARTHAGE to receiue their pay. The ſouldiers obeyed his commandement; ſome of them making their fault leſſe then it was; as men doe often flatter them ſelues: others alſo truſting to the Captaines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreme in puniſhment: For Scipio was wont to ſay, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMANES citizen, then to kill a thouſand enemies. The rumor ranne alſo, that Scipio had an other amicitie, the which he looked for to ioine with them, and then to ſet vpon the kings, Mandonius & Indibilis who made warre with the SVBSSITANS. Theſe ſouldiers departing from SVERO, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come to the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were environned with all the legions armie. When the ROMANES Generall ſitting in place of iudgement, ſhewed him ſelfe before all the company in as good health & good diſpoſition of bodie as euery he was in all his youth. Then he made a harp & ſweete oration, full of grievous complaints in ſomuch as there was not one of all the ſouldiers that were warned, that durſt caſt up their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face: they were ſo aſhamed. For their confeſſions did accuſe them for the fault they had committed, and the feare of death did take their wits and ſences from them, & the preſence of their gracious Captaine, made them bluſh as well as were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherefore there was a generall and ſorrowfull ſilence of all men. So after he had ended this oration, he cauſed the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the whole assembly, who, after they had bene whipped according to the manner, were presently beheaded, the which was a fearful and lamentable sight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other souldiers to be sworn againe, and then went and proclaimed warre against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they considering with them selves, howe the ROMANES souldiers that had rebelled in the campe, were put to death: they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leaued an army of twentie thousand footemen, & two thousand horsemen, and came downe with them against the ROMANES. Scipio having intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that other nations could rebel: he departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speede as he could to meete with the enemy. The kings were camped in a very strong place, and trusted to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor also to refuse the battell if it were offered them. Howbeit it chaunced by the enemes of both camps, that within few dayes, they being prouoked by the ROMANES, came downe & set their men in battell ray, & ioyned battell with Scipio: so that a good while together, the fight was very bloody & cruel. But at length the SPANYARDS seeing them selves compassed in behinde, and being driuen to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on euery side, they were overcome: so that the third parte of them scarcely saved them selves by flying. Mandonius & Indibilis seeing them selves utterly vndone, & that there was no hope nor remedy left: they sent Ambassadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receiue them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMANES, yet thinking it more honorable to overcome the enemy by curtesie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, and only commaunded them to geue him money to pay his souldiers. In the meane time Masiniſſa came from GADES, & landed: because he would him selfe in person confirme the friendship he had offered Scipio in his absence, by the means of M. Syllanus, and also speake with him face to face, whom he iudged to be a worthy man, for the famous victories he had obtained. And in truth Masiniſſa was not deceived in the opinion he had of the valliantes & vertues of Scipio, but found him the selfe same man whom he before had imagined him to be in his minde: the which but seldom happeneth so notwithstanding. For besides the great rare giftes of nature that Scipio had aboue all others, there was in him also a certaine Princely grace and maiestie. Furthermore, he was marvellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a passing gift to winne euery man. He was verie graue in his gesture and behaviour, and euery ware long heare. Masiniſſa being come to salute him, when he sawe him, he had him in suche admiration as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes of him; nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruellously for sending his Nephewe vnto him, and promised him that his deedes shoulde confirme and witnesse the friendship agreed vpon betwene them: the which he euery after inuiolable kept vnto the ROMANES, euen to the hower of his death. So all the nations of SPAYNE became subiect to the Empire of ROME, or at the least their confederates: whereupon those of GADES also following the example of others, came and yielded themselves vnto the ROMANES. This is a verie auncient nation, and if we may credit the reports of it: as CARTHAGE WAS IN AFRIKE, and THERE IN BOEOTIA, so WAS GADES vpon the sea, a Colony of the TYRANS. Scipio after he had conquered all SPAYNE, and driuen out the CARTHAGINIANS, considering that there remained nothing more for him to doe: he left the gouernment of the prouince vnto L. Leptinus, and to Masiniſſa Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arrived at ROME, the Senate gaue him audience out of the cite, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he had particularly told the of the things he had valiantly & fortunately brought to end: & further, that he had overcome foure Captaines in diuers foughten fields & also put to flight foure armies of the enemies, & driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAYNE, & that there was no nation left in all those parts, but was subdured to the ROMANES, the Senate gaue iudgement, that all these things were worthy of a noble triumphe. But because neuer man yet was suffered to enter into ROME in triumphe, for any victories he had obtained, whilest he was only but Viceconsul, and had not yet bene Consul: the Senators thought it not good, and Scipio him selfe also made no great sure for it, because he would not be an occasion to bring in any newe custome, and to breake the olde. So when he came into the cite, he was afterwarde declared Consul, with the great good will and consent of the whole assembly. It is reported that there neuer came such a world of people to ROME, as were there at that time, not only for the assemblies sake, but more to see P. Cor. Scipio. Wherefore, not the ROMANES only, but all the straungers also that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and sayd both openly and priuately: that they should send him into AFRIKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne contrie. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske aduise of the people, if the Senate would be against such a wortheie enterprise. For amongst the peres and Senators, there were some that vehemently inueyed against that opinion, and among the rest, Fabius Maximus speciallie, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to overcome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to driue Annibal out of ITALIE, but that only: and that all other counsell were in vaine, and vnprofitable. After this matter was long debated in counsell, Sicilia was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with all his armie into AFRIKE, if he thought it meete and profitable for the common wealth. The decree of the Senate being published, euery mans minde ranne of so great enterprises, that they perswaded them selves AFRIKE was alreadye their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio saw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iorney, because of the pouertie of the common treasure, and for lacke of young men: the flower and choyce of the which was utterly gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Annibal had geuen them. Howbeit to satisfie euery mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speede he could, to prepare things necessarie for the warres. So diuers people of THYSCAN, and of the VMBRIANS, offered to helpe him to their best power: some of them gaue him timber to builde his shippes, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kinde of vittells and munition for his armie. The shippes being built, and all the armie by sea put in readines, in the space of fise and fortie dayes, a thing incredible to many: Scipio departed out of ITALIE, and sailed towards SICILIE. But when he came to take muster of his armie, he speciallie chose those that had serued long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for verie expert souldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partly wanne them by curtesie, and partly by compulsion compelled them to geue him aide for the warre he tooke in hand, the which he ment to make in AFRIKE, when the time of the yeare should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diuers cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the sayd prouince, and commaunded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euery man with horse and armor. Then comming at the day appointed, according to his commaundement: the Consul bad them chooe whether they would followe him in the warres of AFRIKE, or else deliuer vp their armor & horse, to as many other ROMANES as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed three hundred other young ROMANES in their places, whom he had brought out of ITALIE with him vnarmed, because he would mount and arme them at the Sicilians cost, as in deede it chaunced. Afterwards, they did him great seruice in AFRIKE, in many great battells. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his armie in garrison for the winter time, when he came to SYRACUSA, taking order not only for the preparation of warre, but also for the affaires of SICILIA. There when it was tolde him by complaint of diuers, that there was a great companie of ITALIAN souldiers in that cite, who would not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the warres, but kept them still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enioyned them by speciall commaundement to make restitution to the SYRACUSANS: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commaundement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hartes of SICILIA, and was reported to be a iust and vpright Consul. In the meane time he was aduertised by Caius Lelius, that returned out of AFRIKE with great spoyle: howe King Masiniſſa was very desirous of his coming thither, and that he instantly prayed him he would come into AFRIKE, as soone as he could possible; so it were without the preiudice of the common wealth. Moreouer, that diuers nations and people of AFRIKE had the like defire: who hating the government of the CARTHAGINIANS, desired nothing more, then some good occasion to rebell. Nowe this iorney was not deferred through Scipios fault or negligence, considering that such a Captaine could hardly be founde that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of SICILIA, and the oportunitie he had to recouer LOCRES againe, did himer that he could not bring his purpose to passe according to his minde. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieved him much: because that hauing left him at LOCRES, he fell to all sortes of insolencie, as to deslowe women, and to spoyle the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruelously offended with these iniuste troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subiect to the government of so vile & wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of LOCRES being arriued at ROME, and exhibiting their complaintes in open Senate of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter so grieuouly, that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipios enemies hauing gotten matter enough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offered the LOCRIANS, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had suffred all these things more negligently, then became the office or duty of a Consul. They added thereto moreover, that his army he had in SICILE was altogether vnruely & vnseruicable, & regarded not the ordinances of the campe: and that the Captaine him selfe was carelessse, & altogether geuen ouer to pleasure and idleness. But aboute all others, Fabius Maximus was his heauy enemy, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modesty and reason, and thought good to call him presently home out of SICILIA, and to dismishe him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, & extreme. Wherefore following Quintus Metellus counsell, the Senators appointed ten Ambassadors to go into SICILIA, to make diligent inquiry, whether the accusations objected against Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they should command him in the name of the Senate presently to returne into ITALY. And on the other side, if they found that he was vniuistly accused, and only through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detractors: then that they should send him to his arinie, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this warre. So when the Ambassadors were arriued in SICILIA, after they had made diligent inquiry according to the articles of their commission: they could not finde that Scipio was faultie in any thing, sauing that he had too lightly passed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was verie liberrall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding courteous and mercifull also in punishing of them. But when they saw his army, his shippes, and all his other furniture and munition for warre: it is reported that they wondred so much to see the great abundance and good order taken for all thinges, that when they returned to ROME, they greatly commended Scipio, and reiecting all the accusations of his accusers, they did promise the Senate and people of ROME, assured hope of victory. So when all these home troubles at ROME were taken away, there chaunced other outward troubles a broad that grieved him much. For the Ambassadors of king Syphax came and told him that their maister had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become friend to Hafdrubal, whose daughter he had married: and therefore that he wished him if he ment to do his contry good, to make no attempt vpon AFRIKE, for he was determined to reckon the CARTHAGINIANS friends his, & also to set vpon them whom the CARTHAGINIANS account their enemies. Scipio quicklie returned the Ambassadors againe vnto Syphax, because the effect of their coming should not be blown abroad in his campe: & gaue them letters, in the which he praised king Syphax, that remembering his league and faithfull promise, he should beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name of a ROMANE, and faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told the, that the Ambassadors of king Syphax were come into SICILE, to complaine of his long tarying, as Masiniissa had done before. Therefore he was to hasten his iorney to goe into AFRIKE, and thereupon commaunded all his souldiers to put them selues in readines, and to provide all things necessary for their iorney. The Consuls commaundement being published through all SICILE, there repaired immediatly vnto Lilybea a multitude of people

A people, not only of those that were to saile into AFRIKE, but of others also that came to see the fleet & army of the ROMANES: because they neuer saw an army better furnished, nor set out with all things necessary for warre, nor better replenished with souldiers, then that. So Scipio, all things being ready, imbarcked at LILYBEA with so earnest a desire to passe ouer the sea, that neither owens nor wind did content his minde. Yet he was brought in few daies sailing, to the promontory or mountaine called Fayer, and there he put all his men a land. The newes of his arriual flying straight to CARTHAGE, all the city was presently in such a vprore, that sodainly they sounded the alarom, and garded the gates & walls, as appeareth by testimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulum time, vnto that present day, it was almost fifty yeares space since any ROMANE Captaine euer entred AFRIKE with force of armes. And therefore it was no maruell though they were affrayed, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did encrease their feare the more, because the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captaine marchable with him. Hafdrubal the sonne of Gisgo had the name at that time of a lusty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithstanding bene ouercome, and driuen out of SPAYNE by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope & safety of their contry in him, & in king Syphax that mighty king: they neuer left intreating the one, nor perswading the other, to come & helpe the affaires of AFRIKE, with all the speede they could possible. So, whilst they two were preparing to ioyne both their armies together, Annibal the sonne of Hamilcar, being appointed to kepe the next contry adioyning to it, came against the ROMANES. Scipio after he had destroyed the contry, & enriched his army with great spoyle: he camped by the city of VITICA, to see if it were possible for him to win so noble and wealthy a city, and being besides so commodious for the warres both by sea and land. At the selfe same time Masiniissa came to the ROMANES campe, and was inflamed with a vehement desire to make warre against king Syphax, by whom he had before bene driuen out of his kingdom & inheritance. Scipio, that had knowen him in SPAYNE, a young Prince of an excellent wit, and quick & valliant of his hand: he sent him to discouer the army of the enemies, before the CARTHAGINIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to vse all the deuise and meanes he could possible to intise Hanno to fight. Masiniissa as he was commaunded, began to prouoke the enemy, and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his legions armed, looking for a good hower to fight. The armie of the enemies was nowe wearied, when the ROMANES came to set vpon them with their freshe army. Hanno at the first onset was ouercome, & slaine, with most of his men: and all the rest fled, and disperfed them selues here and there, where they thought they might best scape. After this victory, Scipio returning backe againe to besiege the city of VITICA: the sodaine coming of Hafdrubal and king Syphax, made him to leaue of his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great army both of footemen & horsemen, and came and camped not farre from the ROMANES. Scipio perceiuing that, raised his siege immediatly, and came and fortified his campe vpon a hill, from whence he might go & fight with the enemy, and molest them of VITICA, and also keepe his shippes safe that roade at ancker. Howbeit the time of the yeare being comen, that both armies were to dispose their men in garrisons for the winter season: he determined to send vnto king Syphax to feele his minde, and to make him leaue the friendshipp of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were possible. For he knew well it was his marriage with Sophonisba, that through her flattering perswasions had brought him to that furie, that he had not only forsaken the friendshipp of the ROMANES, but also ment to destroy them, contrary to his faith and promise: and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax hauing vnderstoode Scipios message sent him, he answered, that in dede it was time not only to leaue the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but also to geue vp all thought of warre: and so promised, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gaue good eare vnto it, and caught holde of an excellent fine deuise. He chose the valliantest souldiers in his army, apparelled them like slaues, and made them waite vpon the Ambassadors, and gaue them instructions what they should doe. These fellows, whilst the Ambassadors and king Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the consultation helde longer then it was wont to doe: they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to see all the wayes and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes instructions. After they had done this diuers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio seemed to make preparation for warres, (as being out of hope of any peace) & to make his army ready by sea, preparing engines of batterie to returne to besiege Vtica, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through all the contry, to perswade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines & pery Captaines of his army together, he made them priuy to his intent & enterprise. He told them that both the enemies camps lay not farre a lunder, of the which, the one of them had all their tentes & cabbons of wodde: and the building of the other campe was all of reedes, so that they were both easie to be burnt. Whereupon hauing sent for Masiniſſa, and Caius Lalius to come vnto him, he gaue them charge about midnight to geue alarm vnto Syphax campe, and to set it a fire: and that he him selfe on the other side, would set vpon the CARTHAGINIANS campe. They two obeying Scipioes commaundement, performed his will without delay, & came at the hower appointed the to assaile the NVMIDIANS campe, and so did set the houses of reedes afire, which tooke fire in such sort, as the flame was immediately rounde about the campe. The NVMIDIANS at the first, thinking the fire had comen by misfortune, ranne thither straight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found them selues among the legions of the ROMANES, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, seeing them selues so compassed in on all sides, they saw their best remedie was to flie. On the other side also, where Scipioes army was: the CARTHAGINIANS campe was almost all burnt, an the enemies put to flight with such cruell slaughter, that some wyters affirme there were slaine that night about fortie thousand men, as well CARTHAGINIANS NVMIDIANS. This great ouerthrow and slaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in such a feare and terror, that some thought best to send for Annibal out of ITALIE: and others gaue aduise to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIANS faction which was rich and wealthy, & alke together against the peace makers: they so preuailed, that they leaued a new power to begin warre againe. King Syphax and Hafirubal, hauing leaued a great multitude of foote-men and horsemen againe, renewed their armie sooner then was looked for, and came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer against the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderstanding of that, would not tary, but determined to geue them battell, whilest his men were in good hart, and willing to fight. So it chaunced at the first, by the neerenes of both their camps, that there were certaine skirmishes: but in the end, the armies came to ioyne battell, and the ROMANES fought with such corage & terror, that at the first onset, they made the NVMIDIANS & CARTHAGINIANS flie, and slue the most part of them. Hafirubal and Syphax (scaped, by flying out of the slaughter. Scipio sent Masiniſſa, & Caius Lalius with the light horsemen to geue them chase. Syphax being comen into NVMIDIA, & from thence into his owne realme & kingdom he leaued an army in haft, of all sorts of people, & came to meete with Masiniſſa & Caius Lalius, and was not affrayed to geue them battell. But it was a fond parte of him, considering that he was nothing like so strong as his enemy, neither for nuber of fighting men, nor yet in likelyhood of fouldiers. For neither the fouldiers, nor Captaines of his army were matchable with the fouldiers & Captaines of the ROMANES campe: & therefore king Syphax was easily ouercome by such skilful fouldiers, & moreover was him selfe taken in battell, with many other great noble men, whom Masiniſſa would hardly haue looked for: & the they were brought vnto Scipio. At the first there was a maruelous ioy amog the, when it was told that king Syphax should be brought prisoner vnto the cape: but afterwards when they saw him bound, they were all sorry to see him in such pityfull state, remebring his former greatnes & regall maiesty. For they called to mind how famous the name of this king had bene but a litle before, what wonderful great wealth he had, & also the power of so great a realme & kingdom. Howbeit Scipio the ROMANES Consul, receiued him very courteously, & gently asked him what he ment to change his mind in that sort, & what moued him to make warre with the ROMANES. Then the king remebring his former friendship & faithful promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who only had procured him to deale so dishonorably with the ROMANES: howbeit, that he had so smarted for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme misery,

A fery, to see that his mortall enemy Masiniſſa was also taken with that fraile and mild humor, wherewith he before was possessed. For after Syphax was ouercome and taken, Masiniſſa went vnto CYRTHA, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fell in fancy: who after he had finely wrapped him in with her deconſolable teares and kindnes, he promised her also to deliuer her out of the ROMANES handes, & bicause he might the better performe his promise made, he tooke her to his wife, & married her. VVhere Scipio was informed of these things, it grieved him maruelously. For it was knowne to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the ROMANES meanes: and therefore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the ROMANES. Wherefore if Masiniſſa had without Scipioes consent, vnderaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarrell; then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, & the maiesty of the people of ROME. Furthermore, his filthie lust did agrauate his fault the more, the which seemed to him more intollerable, by how much the continency of the ROMANES Consul was the greater, the which Masiniſſa saw daily before his eyes, and might haue bene a paterne and example vnto him. For Scipio, besides many other proofes and shewes of his vertues, in all places where he obtained victory, he alwayes kept the women vndressed, which were taken prisoners. So, Scipio being much offended with Masiniſſa, (though he shewed it not before company) receiued him very louingly at his returne to the campe: yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproofed him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a severe Captaine. Whereupon Masiniſſa went into his tent and wept, & could not tell what way he should take: howbeit shortly after, perceiving that it was vnpossible for him to keepe promise with Sophonisba, which grieved him to the hart: he sent her poyson, & a message withall, the which she dranke immediately, & so willingly made her selfe away. Furthermore, the CARTHAGINIANS after they had receiued such wonderfull great losses and ouerthrowes, one after another, perceiving that their affaires were brought to suche a straight and extremitie, that they were no more to looke after the enlarging of their dominions, but only to consider which way they might keepe their owne contry: they sent for Annibal to come out of ITALIE. Who returning with great speede into AFRIKA, before he did any thing else, he thought good first to talke with P. Scipio about peace: either bicause he was affrayed of the good fortune of this young man, or else for that he mistrusted he could not otherwise helpe his contrie and common wealth, which he saw decaying, & like to be destroyed. Wherefore a place was appointed, where they might meete according to his desire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this warre. In the end, Scipio offered Annibal such conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the ROMANES were not wearie of warre, and that Scipio him selfe being a young man, had better hope to obtaine victorie, then great desire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being left aside, they brake of their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthie Captaines of the most noble nations that could be, prepared them selues to battell, either to geue or take away in short time from their comorthe weales, the feignorie and Empire of all the worlde. The place where they employed all their force, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the crie of ZANUS: in the which the ROMANES being conquerors, did first make the Elephants flie, then the horsemen, and in the ende brake so fiercely into the foortemen, that they ouerthrew all the armie. It is reported that there were slaine and taken by the ROMANES, about fortie thousand CARTHAGINIANS. Annibal fled out of the fury of the battell, & saved him selfe, though that day he shewed him selfe like a valiant and famous Captaine. For at this battell he had sent his armie in better order then euer he had done before, and had strengthened it, both with the commodity of the place, and reliefe besides: and euen in the verie furie and terror of the battell he so bestowed him selfe among his fouldiers, that the enemies them selues did command & praise him, for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Fernina king Syphax sonne, that brought aide to the CARTHAGINIANS, he put him to flight, and came and brought his army to the walls and haue of CARTHAGE, thinking (as in dede it fel out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would sue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIANS before had bene very good fouldiers, & ready to make warres: so were they now become timorous & faint hearted, especially when they saw their Generall Annibal overcome, in whom they chiefly reposed all their hope and trust, for defense of their contrie. Wherefore they being (as I have sayd) out of hart, sent Ambassadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed clemencie he would graunt them peace. Nowe was great lute made at Rome, to haue the gouernment of the prouince of Africke, and one of the newe Consuls made hast to come and make warre, with full charge and preparation as was meete for his dignitie and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that an other should care away the glorie for ending of so great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN Ambassadors requestes. So, the capitulatio of the articles of peace was offered vnto the *CARTHAGINIAN*s, according to the conquerors mind: and besides all other things, the whole fleet of all their shippes and gallies (in the which consisted much their hope) were taken from them. For when the whole fleet was burnt, it was such a lamentable sight vnto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if CARTHAGE had bene destroyed and rased to the very ground. For as some doe write, there were five hundred shippes burnt of all sortes. These things therefore should make vs all beware of humane frailtie, the which we often forget in our prosperitie. For they that before perswaded them selves to conquer the world, after they had wonne so many great battells and victories of the enimie, and in manner conquered all ITALIE, and so valiantly besides besieged the city of ROME: were in short time after brought to such misery and extremity, that all their power and force being overcome, they had left them no more but the walls of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not sure to keepe them, but through the speciall grace and fauor of the enimie. After these things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not only restore king Masiniissa to his realme againe, but also adding therunto the best part of all king Syphax contrie, they made him one of the mightiest kings of all Africke; and afterwards he gaue honorable gifts vnto euery man as he had deserued. In fine, after he had set all the affaires of Africke at good stay, he brought his army backe againe into ITALIE: at what time there came to ROME a world of people, to see so great and famous a Capitaine, returning from such wonderful great victories. So he entred into Rome with pompe of triumphe, Terentius Cales following of him with a harte on his head, because that through his fauor and frendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybius wryeth, that king Syphax was led in triumphe: howbeit some say he dyed before Scipio triumphed. In deede diuers say that did triumphe, some before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and others afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA & ASIA, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold and siluer in their triumphes; and led also a greater number of prisoners: howbeit one only Annibal that was overcome, and the glorie of so great a warre ended, did make the triumphe of P. Scipio so excellent and famous, that it farre passed all the golde and magnificent pompe of all others triumphes. For after Africke was conquered, no nation then was ashamed to be overcome by the ROMANES. For he made this prouince, as it were a bridge and open passage to increase and enlarge the Empire of ROME, both in MACEDONIA, and also in ASIA, and in other parts of the world besides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call AFRICAN), after the conquest of Africke being returned to ROME, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honors. For in the counsell holden for the election of Censors, although there were diuers others of the noblest houses of ROME that sued for that office: yet he him selfe, and AELIUS PERPETA were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietnes. Afterwards the Censors that followed them, did still one after an other choise Scipio AFRICAN Prince of the Senate: the which dignitie was wont to be geuen to them only, that obtained the type of all honors; through their great conquests and benefits done to their contrie. Shortly after, he was againe chosen Consul with Sempronius Longus, the sonne of that Sempronius whome Annibal overcame in that great overthrow, at the battell by the riuer of Trebia: They two were the first (as it is reported) that deuided the noble men and Senators from the people, in the shewe place to see pastime. This separation was verie odious to the people of ROME; and they were maruelously offended with the Consuls for it: because they tooke it, that increasing the honor of the state of the Senators, they thereby also discountenance and abase them. Some say also, that

A Scipio AFRICAN afterwards repented him selfe that he had taken away the olde custome, and brought in a newe. At that time there fell out great variance between Masiniissa and the CARTHAGINIANS touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate sent Scipio thither with two other commissioners: who after they had hearde the cause of their quarrell, they left the matter as they founde it, and would proceede no further in it. And this they did, because that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with ciuil warres at home, should take vpon them no other warres abroad, neither should haue leasure to attempt any alteration otherwise. For the ROMANES had great warre with king Antiochus; the CARTHAGINIANS was there with him, who still stirred vp the olde enemies against the ROMANES, and practised to raise vp new enemies against them, & in all things to counsell the CARTHAGINIANS to cast away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMANES had brought them into vnder the title of peace, & to proue the frendship of the kings. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMANES hauing obtained victorie, and driuen king Antiochus out of GREECE: they intended also to conquer ASIA: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN, as a man that was borne to ende warres of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio, and Caius Lalius were Consuls; & either of them made lute for the gouernment of ASIA. The matter being consulted vpon, the Senate stood doubtfull what iudgement they should geue, betwixt two so famous men. Howbeit, because Lalius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater estimation: the Senate beganne to take his parte. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, prayed the Senate that they would not dishonor his house, & tolde them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was besides verie wise; and that he him selfe also would be his Lieutenaut: he had no sooner spoken the wordes, but the Senators re- ceiuied him with great ioy, and prelenidie did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordeined in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should goe into GREECE to make warre with the MACEDONIANS, and that from thence he should goe into ASIA, if he thought good, to make warre with king Antiochus: and also that he should take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, because he should goe against Annibal, that was in Antiochus armie. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he first shewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwards also vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, considering the great things he had done? For, notwithstanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had overcome Annibal, that had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praise of martiall discipline: yet of his owne good nature, he made him selfe inferiori to his younger brother, because he might haue the honour of obtaininge the gouernment of that prouince from his fellowe Consul Lalius, that was so well beloued, and of so great estimation. Lucius Scipio the Consul brought great honor to his contrie by that warre, for that he followed the sounde and faithfull counsell of his brother. For first of all goinge into GREECE, he tooke truce for sixe monethes with the MACEDONIANS, through the aduise of his brother AFRICAN; who counseled him, that setting all things a parte, he should straight goe into ASIA, where the warre was ryft. Afterwards also he wanne Prusias king of BITHYNIA from Antiochus frendshippe, who before was waing vp & downe, doubtful which side to take, and all through his brother AFRICAN meanes and practise. So the authoritie of the AFRICAN was verie great, and all those that would obtaine any thing of the Consul, came first to the AFRICAN to be their meane and intercessor. Nowe when he came into ASIA, Antiochus Ambassador, and Heralides BYZANTINE, came vnto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly tolde their message, perceiving that they could not obtaine reasonable condicions of peace: they priuately talked with Scipio AFRICAN as they were commaunded, and practised the best they could to make him king Antiochus frende. For they tolde him, that Antiochus would sende him his younger sonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would be willinge to make him his companion in the gouernment of all his realme, only reseruing the name and title of the king. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no lesse in faithfullnesse and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he tolde them, that if his sonne should take him for a maruelous frendlie gifte: and that for a priuate good time, told him againe, that he should not haue married her without consent of her mother, though A he could haue bestowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This answer liked Scipio marvellous wel, when he saw that his wife was of his mind, touching the marriage of their Daughter. I knowe it is thought of some, that it was attributed to Tiberius the sonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in lawe. For Polybius, and other auncient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchus, was snatched vnto Gracchus after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was married vnto Aemylia the Daughter of L. Paulus Aemilius Consul, that was slayne at the battell of CANNES. By her he had two Daughters, of the which the eldest was married vnto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the younger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before, or after the death of his father. Nowe touching his sonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We haue spoken of his younger sonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards frankly sent vnto his father: of whome notwithstanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, sauing that some say he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicereus his fathers Secretary. There appeareth in writing also, that the younger AFRICAN was adopted by the sonne of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Maior sayth, how weak (sayd he) was the sonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his sonne? And in his sixth booke de re pub. Aemilius the father exhorteth Scipio his sonne, to follow iustice and piety, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers doe diuersly varie: for some say that he dyed, and was buried at ROME. And for prooff thereof they doe bringe forth the monument which was set vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which stood three statues or images, two whereof were the images of P. and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And surely that which Cicero wrote, seemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, sayd he, was marvellously beloued of AFRICAN the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buried in Scipios tombe. Other authors write also, (and surely they agree best with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN dyed at LINTERNUM, and that there he was buried at his owne appoyment: because his contry fo vnthankfully acknowledging his seruice, should do him no honor at his death: and that there they fet him vp a tombe, and his statue vpon that, the which afterwards was blowne downe by a tempest of wind, and the which Linus him selfe witnessed he saw. Furthermore, by CATO this Epitaph was grauen in a plate of copper, set in a marbell tombe.

Now touching the time of his death, hauing made great searche for it, I haue found in certaine Graeke Authors, that the AFRICAN liued foure and fifty yeares, and dyed shortly after. Furthermore, he was a noble Capitaine, and worthy of all commendation for martiall discipline, and besides excelled in all other vertues: the which did so delight his mind, that he was wont to say, he was neuer lesse idle, then when he tooke his ease: neither more solitary, then when he was alone. For some times he would withdraw him selfe out of the assembly, & from all mens company, and thought him self safe when he was alone. The fame of his noble deedes was so great, that wheresoeuer he went, all sortes of people would come and see him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNUM, there came certaine rousers vnto him to see fo famous

THE COMPARISON OF Annibal with P. Scipio African.

OW let vs compare Annibal and Scipios deedes together, as touching their ciuill discipline. First, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifest that both of them haue bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they haue not onely bene comparable with the noblest Kinges and Princes in their time (being also in that age, when warres florished most) but with those also that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they hauing great and heavy enemies in their contry, (who fought to overthrow all their doings and enterprises) could possibly geue thorough with so great matters, and to obtayne such happie and famous victories in strange and foreigne warres. Therefore passing ouer all other matters, what a doe had P. Scipio, before he could obtayne to be sent into AFRICE, to make warre with the CARTAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other noble men of the citie being greatly against it? Again, what enemy had Annibal of HANNO, who was Prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now, they both hauing overcome such great troubles at home, did notwithstanding bringe things to end worthy perpetuall memorie: not by chance, as it happeneth vnto many, but through their indutrie, great wisdom, and counsell. So, diuers doe wonder greatly at Annibals courage and noble mind: who after he had sacked the citie of SAGUNTUS, came boldly from the furdest part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great army of footemen and horsemen, and came to make warre with a great state and common wealth, the which his predecessors alwayes dreaded: and after he had wonne many battells, and slayne sundry Consuls and Captaines of the ROMANES, he came and camped hard by the citie of ROME it selfe, and practised strange kings and farronations to make warre with the ROMANES. He that was able to doe so great things as these, might can not otherwise thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Capitaine. Others also speaking of Scipio, doe greatly praise and commend him for the foure Chiefaimes he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which he defeated, and purto flight in SPAIN, and also for that he ouercame and tooke that great king Syrax prisoner. In fine, they come to praise that famous battell in the which Scipio ouercame Annibal at ZAMA. For if Fabius (sayd they) were praysed because he was not overcome by Annibal: what estimation will they make of the AFRICAN, that in a pitched battell ouercame that so famous & dreadful Capitaine Annibal, and also did ende to daungerous a warre? Besides al this, the Scipio did alwayes make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemy in plaine field. Where Annibal in contrary manner did alwayes vse craft and subtilty, and was full of stratagemes & policie. And therefore all Authors, both Graeke and Latyn, doe count him very fine and furell. Furthermore, they greatly commend Annibal for that he maynteyned his army of the sundry nations, so long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMANES: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other side they blame him againe, because he did not follow his victory, when he had ouercomen the ROMANES at that famous battell of CANNES: and also because he spoyled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of CAMPANIA and APULIA, whereby they were so changed, that they seemed to be other souldiers then those that had ouercomen the ROMANES, at the sundry battells of TREBIA, THASYS MENE, and CANNES. All writers doe reprove these things in Annibal, but specially his crueltie. For amongst other things, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwards to burne them alive? What shall a man say of them whome he cruelly put to death, in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other side, if we shall rather credit the best authors that write, then a number of other detractors and malicious writers: we may say he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely liuely and valiant in fight, but also courteous and mercifull after victorie. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantnes, the vanquished his mercy and clemency, & all other men his faithfulness. Now therefore, let vs tel you what his continency & liberalitie was, the which he shewed in SPAYNE vnto a young Lady taken prisoner, and vnto Lucius Prince of the CARTHAGINIANS: doth it not deserue great prayse? Nowe for their priuate doings, they were both virtuously brought vp, and both of them imbraced learned men. For as it is reported, Annibal was very familiar with Socilius LACEDÆMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Ennius the Poet. Some saye also, that Annibal was so well learned in the Græke tongue, that he wrote an historie in Græke touching the deedes of Mantius Vols. Now truly I doe agree with Cicero, that sayd in his booke de Oratore, that Annibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHESVS, discoursing very largely of the office and duty of a Chieftaine and generall, and of the martiall lawes & ordinaunces: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philosopher, he should aunswer in no very perfit Græke, but yet in Græke, that he had seene many old doting fooles, but that he had neuer seene a greater doted then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, & Annibal had a sharpe tawnting wit in his aunswers. When king Antiochus on a time prepared to make warre with the ROMANES, and had put his army into the field, not so well furnished with armor and weapon, as with gold and siluer: he asked Annibal, if he thought his army sufficient for the ROMANES? yea (Sir) quoth he, that they be, were the enemies neuer so courteous. This may truly be sayd of Annibal, that he obtayned many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the destruction of his contry. Scipio in contrary manner did preserve his contry in such safetie, and also did so much increase the dominions thereof, that as many as shall looke into his desert, they can not but call ROME vnthankfull, which liked rather that the AFRICAN (preserver of the cite) should goe out of ROME, then that they would repress the fury and insolency of a few. And for myne owne opinion; I can not thinke well of that cite, that so vnthankfully hath suffred so worthy and innocent a person to be iniured: and so would I also haue thought it more blame worthy, if the cite had bene an ayder of the iniury offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men doe report) gaue great thanks vnto Tiberius Gracchus, because he did defend the Scipios cause: and the common people also following the AFRICAN, when he visited all the temples of ROME, and lest the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shewe how much they did loue and honor the name of the Scipios. And therefore, if we should iudge the Citizens hats and good wills by those things, men would rather condemne them for cowards, to haue suffered such outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting of his benefits: for there were very few that consented to so wicked a deepe, and all of them in manner were very sorry for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of a great minde, not much regarding the malice of his enemies: was content rather to leaue the cite, then by ciuill warres to destroy it. For he would not come against his contry with ensignes displayed, neither would he sollicite strange nations and mighty kings to come with force, and their ayde, to destroy the cite, the which he had beautified with so many spoyles and triumphes: as Martyne Coriolanus, Dabindes, and diuers others did, by record of ancient histories. For we may easily perceive, how carefull he was to preserve the libertie of Phormio Peripatetician reading Thilo Sophist in Ephesus.

Annibal with his army, vnto king Antiochus.

A OF ROME, because when he was in SPAYNE, he refused the title and name of king which was offered him, and for that he was maruelous angry with the people of ROME, because they would haue made him perpetual Consul and Dictator: and considering also that he commanded they should set vp no statue of him, neither in the place of the assembly, nor in the iudgement seate, nor in the Capitoll. All which honors afterwards were giuen by the Citizens vnto Cesar, that had ouercomen Pompey. These were the ciuill vertues of the AFRICAN, which were great and true prayles of continency. Now therefore, to deliuer you the summe and effect of all these things: these two so famous Captaines are not so much to be compared together in their ciuill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the discipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous victories. To conclude, their deaths were somewhat alike: for they both dyed out of their contries, although Scipio was not condemned by his contry as Annibal was, but would by voluntary banishment dye out of the cite.
